PREFACE TO SECOND EDITION.

THE first republication, nearly twenty years ago, of the United States Supreme Court Reports in the Lawyers' Edition, was an event of public importance. It has resulted, not merely in the increase, but in the literal multiplication, of the number of lawyers and judges who own and use this great series of decisions. It has, therefore, materially extended the influence of those decisions upon the general jurisprudence of the country. Now the inclusion of Rose's Notes obviously adds great value to these reports.

At the end of each volume of reports, several of which are bound in every book of this set, will be found Rose's Notes for that volume. These volumes are separated by colored sheets.

REPORTS OF THE DECISIONS

OF THE

Supreme Court of the United States.

FEBRUARY TERM, 1820.

1*] *[CONSTITUTIONAL LAW.]

HOUSTON v. MOORE.

The act of the state of Pennsylvania, of the 28th of March, 1814, (providing, (sec. 21.) that the officers and privates of the militia of that state, neglecting or refusing to serve, when called into actual service, in pursuance of any order or requisition of the President of the United States, shall be liable to the penalties defined in the act of Congress of the 28th of February, 1795, c. 277, or to any penalty which may have been prescribed since the date of that act, or which may hereafter be prescribed by any law of the United States, and also providing for the trial of such delinquents by a state court-martial, and that a list of the delinquents fined by such court should be furnished to the Marshal of the United States, &c., and also to the Comptroller of the Treasury of the United States, in order that the further proceedings directed to be had thereon by the laws of the United States might be completed), is not repugnant to the constitution and laws of the United States.

THIS was a writ of error to the Supreme Court of the state of Pennsylvania, in a case where was drawn in question the validity 2*] of a statute of that state, on the ground of its repugnancy to the constitution and laws of the United States, and the decision was in favor of its validity. The statute which formed the ground of controversy in the state court was passed on the 28th of March, 1814, and enacts among other things (sec. 21), that every non-commissioned officer and private of the militia who shall have neglected or refused to serve when called into actual service, in pursuance of any order or requisition of the President of the United States, shall be liable to the penalties defined in the act of the Congress of the United States, passed on the 28th of February, 1795; and then proceeds to enumerate them, and to each clause adds, "or shall be liable to any penalty which may have been prescribed since the date of the passing of the said act, or which may hereafter be prescribed by any law of the United States." The statute then further provides, that "within one month after the expiration of the time for which any detachment of militia shall have been called into the service of the United States, by or in pursuance of orders from the President of the United States, the proper brigade inspector shall summon a general or a regimental court-martial, as the case may be, for the trial of such person or persons belonging to the detachment called out, who shall have refused or neglected to march therewith, or to furnish a sufficient substitute; or who, after having marched therewith, shall have returned without leave from his commanding officer, of which delinquents the proper brigade inspector shall furnish to the said court-martial *an accurate list. [*3 And as soon as the said court-martial shall have decided in each of the cases which shall be submitted to their consideration, the President thereof shall furnish to the Marshal of the United States, or to his deputy, and also to the Comptroller of the Treasury of the United States, a list of the delinquents fined, in order that the further proceedings directed to be had thereon by the laws of the United States may be completed."

Houston, the plaintiff in error, and in the original suit, was a private, enrolled in the Pennsylvania militia, and belonging to the detachment of the militia which was ordered out by the Governor of that state, in pursuance of a requisition from the President of the United States, dated the 4th of July, 1814. Being duly notified and called upon, he neglected to march with the detachment to the appointed place of rendezvous. He was tried for this delinquency before a court-martial summoned under the authority of the executive of that state, in pursuance of the section of the statute above referred to. He appeared before the court-martial, pleaded not guilty, and was in due form sentenced to pay a fine; for levying of which on his property, he brought an action of trespass in the State Court of Common Pleas, against the deputy-marshal by whom it was levied. At the trial in that court, the plaintiff prayed the court to instruct the jury, that the first, second and third paragraphs of the 21st section of the above statute of Pennsylvania, so far as they related to the militia called into the *service of the United [*4 States, under the laws of Congress, and who failed to obey the orders of the President of the United States, are contrary to the constitution of the United States, and the laws of Congress made in pursuance thereof, and are, therefore, null and void. The court instructed the jury that these paragraphs were not contrary to the constitution or laws of the United States, and were, therefore, not null and void. A verdict and judgment was thereupon rendered for the defendant, Moore; which judgment being carried by writ of error before the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, the highest court of law or equity of that state, was affirmed; and the cause was then brought before this court, under the 25th section of the judiciary act of 1789, c. 20.

This cause was argued at the last term, and continued to the present term for advisement.

Mr. Hopkins, for the plaintiff in error, argued, that the constitutional power of Congress over the militia is exclusive of state authority, except as to officering and training them according to the discipline prescribed by Congress. By the constitution of the United States (art. 1, s. 8), Congress is invested with power "to provide for calling forth the militia, to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions." And also, "to provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia, and for governing such part of them as may be employed in the service of the United States, reserving to the states respectively [*5] *the appointment of the officers, and the authority of training the militia according to the discipline prescribed by Congress." The terms "to provide for calling forth" import an authority to place the militia under the power of the United States; in certain cases, implying a command, which the militia are bound to obey. Congress has exercised this authority by authorizing the President to call forth the militia in the cases mentioned in the constitution, and inflicting penalties on those who disobey the call.<sup>1</sup> Whenever a draft is made, the persons drafted are immediately, and to all intents and purposes, in the service of the United States, and from that moment all state authority over them ceases. The power to govern the militia thus called forth, and employed in the service of the United States, is exclusively in the national government. A national militia grew out of the federal constitution, and did not previously exist. It is in its very nature one indivisible object, and of the utmost importance to the support of the federal authority and government.<sup>2</sup> But even supposing this power not to be exclusively vested in Congress, and admitting it to be concurrent between the United States government, and the respective state governments; as Congress having legislated on the subject-matter, to the extent of the authority given, state legislation, which is subordinate, is necessarily excluded. Even where the grant of a certain power to the government of the Union is not, [*6] *in express terms, exclusive, yet if the exercise of it by that government be practically inconsistent with the exercise of the same power by the states, their laws must yield to the supremacy of the laws of the United States.<sup>3</sup> Meade's case is an example of the application of the same principle to the very question now before the court.<sup>4</sup> Is it possible that Congress meant to give power to a state court, without naming the court, or granting the power in express terms? The exercise of this jurisdiction by a state court-martial would either oust the United States courts of their jurisdiction or might subject the alleged delinquents to be twice tried and punished for the same offense. If the state court could try them, the Governor of the state could pardon them for an offense committed against the laws of the United States. There is, in various particulars, a manifest repugnancy between the two laws. They are in direct collision; and, consequently, the state law is void. Again, if the state of Pennsylvania had power to pass the act of the 28th of March, 1814, or the 21st section of that act, it was superseded by the act of Congress of the 18th of April, 1814, c. 670, occupying the same ground, and making a more complete provision on the same subject. These two laws are still more manifestly repugnant and inconsistent with each other. Again, if the state law was constitutional, and not superseded by the act of Congress of the 18th of April, 1814, c. 670, still the treaty of peace *between the [*7] United States and Great Britain, ratified in February, 1815, suspended and abrogated all proceedings under the state law.

Mr. C. J. Ingersoll and Mr. Rogers, contra, insisted, that there were many cases in which the laws of the United States are carried into effect by state courts and state officers; that this was contemplated by the framers of the constitution; that the Governor of Pennsylvania, by whom the court-martial, in the present case, was summoned, is the commander-in-chief of the militia of that state, except when called into the actual service of the United States. The militia drafted in pursuance of the requisition of the President were not in actual service, until mustered, and in the pay of the United States, until they reached the place of rendezvous, and were put under the command of the United States officers. It is not the requisition, but the obedience to the requisition, which makes the person drafted amenable to martial law, as a part of the military force of the Union. When the constitution speaks of the power of "calling forth" the militia, it means an effectual calling. The plaintiff was called, but not called forth. The power invested in Congress is to determine in what mode the requisition shall be made, how the quota of each state is to be apportioned, from what states requisitions shall be made in particular cases, and by what process the call is to be enforced. Congress not having directed the mode by which courts-martial are to be summoned and held for the purpose of enforcing it, the states have a constitutional *authority to supply the omission. [*8] Before this court proceeds to declare the state law made for this purpose to be void, it must be satisfied, beyond all doubt, of its repugnancy to the constitution.<sup>5</sup> The case must fall within some of the express prohibitory clauses of the constitution, or some of its clearly implied prohibitions. It must not be the exercise of a political discretion with which the legislature is invested, for that can never become the subject of judicial cognizance. It is insisted that the power of Congress over the militia is a concurrent, and not an exclusive power. All powers, which previously existed in the states, and which are not expressly delegated to the United States, are reserved.<sup>1</sup> The power of making laws on the subject of the militia is not prohibited to the states, and has always been exercised by them. The necessity of a concurrent jurisdiction in certain cases results from the peculiar division of the powers of sovereignty in our government; and the principle, that all authorities of which the states are not expressly divested in favor of the Union, or the exercise of which, by the states, would be repugnant to those granted to the Union, are reserved to the states, is not only a theoretical consequence of that division, but is clearly admitted by the whole tenor of the constitution. The contemporaneous construction of the constitution, *by those who supported its adoption, supposes the power in question to be concurrent, and not exclusive.<sup>2</sup> The power of the states over the militia is not taken away; it existed in them before the establishment of the constitution, and there being no negative clause prohibiting its exercise by them, it still resides in the states, so far as an exercise of it by them is not absolutely repugnant to the authority of the Union. Before the militia are actually employed in the service of the United States, Congress has only a power concurrent with that of the states, to provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining them. The authority of appointing the officers and training the militia, is expressly reserved to the states, because, in these respects, it was intended that they should have an exclusive power. So, also, Congress has the exclusive power of governing such part of the militia as may be actually employed in the service of the United States; but not until it is thus actually employed. The power of governing the militia is the power of subjecting it to the rules and articles of war. But it is a principle manifestly implied in the constitution, that the militia cannot be subjected to martial law, except when in actual service, in time of war, rebellion, or invasion.<sup>3</sup> It necessarily results from the circumstance of the power of making provision for organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia being concurrent, that 10*] if *Congress has not legislated upon any part of the subject, the states have a right to supply the omission. This right has been exercised, in the present case, in aid of, and not in hostility to, the federal authority. The fines which are collected under the law are not appropriated to the use of the state, but are to be paid into the treasury of the Union. The power of making uniform laws of naturalization is different from that now under consideration. The power of naturalization is an authority granted to the Union, to which a similar authority in the states would be absolutely and totally repugnant. A naturalized citizen of one state would be entitled to all the privileges of a citizen in every other state, and the greatest confusion would be produced by a variety of rules on the subject. But even naturalization has been sometimes held to be a power residing concurrently in the Union and the states, and to be exercised by the latter in such a way as not to contravene the rule established by the Union.<sup>4</sup> But in the present case, the state law is not inconsistent with the act of Congress. It comes in aid of it. It supplies its defects, and remedies its imperfections. It co-operates with it for the promotion of the same end. The offense which is made punishable by the state law, is an offense against the state, as well as the Union. It being the duty of the state to furnish its quota, it has a right to compel the drafted militia to appear and march. Calling the militia forth, and governing them after they are in actual service, *are two distinct [*11 things. A state law, acting upon the militia before they have entered into the actual service of the Union, is so far from interfering with the power of Congress to legislate on the same subject that it may have, and, we contend, that it does have, in the present case, a powerful effect in aid of the national authority. But it would be almost impossible for the state to enact a law concerning the militia, after they are in the actual service of the United States, which would not be irreconcilable with the authority of the latter. Even supposing that Congress should pass a law inflicting one penalty for disobedience to the call, and the state inflict another, they would still both co-operate to the same end. In practice, the delinquent could not be punished twice for the same offense; but there would be no theoretical repugnancy between the two laws. Congress, in the statutes enacted by them, have not intended to compel citizens enrolled in the militia to enter into the actual service of the United States. It is not a conscription; but a draft, with the option to the individual to be excused from a specific performance of the duty by the payment of a pecuniary composition. The acts of Congress are defective in not providing how, or by whom, courts-martial shall be held, for the trial of delinquents, and the collection of these pecuniary penalties. The state legislature, acting with a sincere desire to promote the objects of the national government, supplied these defects, by adding such details as were indispensably necessary to execute the acts of Congress. *There is, then, a per- [*12 fect harmony between the two laws.

The judgment of the court was delivered at the present term, by Mr. Justice WASHINGTON, who, after stating the facts of the case, proceeded as follows:

There is but one question in this cause, and it is, whether the act of the legislature of Pennsylvania, under the authority of which the plaintiff in error was tried, and sentenced to pay a fine, is repugnant to the constitution of the United States, or not?

But before this question can be clearly understood, it will be necessary to inquire: 1. What are the powers granted to the general government, by the constitution of the United States over the militia? and, 2. To what extent they have been assumed and exercised.

1. The constitution declares that Congress shall have power to provide for calling forth the militia in three specified cases; for organizing, arming, and disciplining them; and for governing such part of them as may be employed in the service of the United States; reserving to the states, respectively, the appointment of the officers, and the authority of training the militia according to the discipline prescribed by Congress. It is further provided, that the President of the United States shall be commander of the militia, when called into the actual service of the United States.

2. After the constitution went into operation, Congress proceeded by many successive acts to 13*] exercise these powers, and to provide for all the cases contemplated by the constitution.

The act of the 2d of May, 1792, which is re-enacted almost verbatim by that of the 28th of February, 1795, authorizes the President of the United States, in case of invasion, or of imminent danger of it, or when it may be necessary for executing the laws of the United States, or to suppress insurrections, to call forth such number of the militia of the states most convenient to the scene of action, as he may judge necessary, and to issue his orders for that purpose to such officer of the militia as he shall think proper. It prescribes the amount of pay and allowances of the militia so called forth, and employed in the service of the United States, and subjects them to the rules and articles of war applicable to the regular troops. It then proceeds to prescribe the punishment to be inflicted upon delinquents, and the tribunal which is to try them, by declaring that every officer or private who should fail to obey the orders of the President, in any of the cases before recited, should be liable to pay a certain fine, to be determined and adjudged by a court-martial, and to be imprisoned, by a like sentence, on failure of payment. The courts-martial for the trial of militia, are to be composed of militia officers only, and the fines to be certified by the presiding officer of the court, to the martial of the district, and to be levied by him, and, also, to the supervisor, to whom the fines are to be paid over.

The act of the 18th of April, 1814, provides, that courts-martial, to be composed of militia 14*] officers *only, for the trial of militia, drafted, detached and called forth for the service of the United States, whether acting in conjunction with the regular forces or otherwise, shall, whenever necessary, be appointed, held, and conducted in the manner prescribed by the rules and articles of war, for appointing, holding, and conducting courts-martial for the trial of delinquents in the army of the United States. Where the punishment prescribed is by stoppage of pay, or imposing a fine limited by the amount of pay, the same is to have relation to the monthly pay existing at the time the offense was committed. The residue of the act is employed in prescribing the manner of conducting the trial; the rules of evidence for the government of the court; the time of service, and other matters not so material to the present inquiry. The only remaining act of Congress which it will be necessary to notice in this general summary of the laws, is that of the 8th of May, 1792, for establishing an uniform militia in the United States. It declares who shall be subject to be enrolled in the militia, and who shall be exempt; what arms and accoutrements the officers and privates shall provide themselves with; arranges them into divisions, brigades, regiments, battalions, and companies, in such manner as the state legislatures may direct; declares the rules of discipline by which the militia is to be governed, and makes provision for such as should be disabled whilst in the actual service of the United States. The pay and subsistence of the militia, whilst in service, are provided *for by other acts of Congress, and par- [*15 ticularly by one passed on the third of January, 1795.

The laws which I have referred to, amount to a full execution of the powers conferred upon Congress by the constitution. They provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasion. They also provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia, and for governing such part of them as may be employed in the service of the United States; leaving to the states respectively the appointment of the officers, and the authority of training them according to the discipline prescribed by Congress.

This system may not be formed with as much wisdom as, in the opinion of some, it might have been, or as time and experience may hereafter suggest. But to my apprehension, the whole ground of Congressional legislation is covered by the laws referred to. The manner in which the militia is to be organized, armed, disciplined, and governed, is fully prescribed; provisions are made for drafting, detaching, and calling forth the state quotas, when required by the President. The President's orders may be given to the chief executive magistrate of the state, or to any militia officer he may think proper; neglect, or refusal to obey orders, is declared to be an offense against the laws of the United States, and subjects the offender to trial, sentence and punishment, to be adjudged by a court-martial, to be summoned in the way pointed out by the articles and rules of war; and the mode of proceeding to *be observed by these courts, [*16 is detailed with all necessary perspicuity.

If I am not mistaken in this view of the subject, the way is now open for the examination of the great question in the cause. Is it competent to a court-martial, deriving its jurisdiction under state authority, to try, and to punish militia-men, drafted, detached, and called forth by the President into the service of the United States, who have refused, or neglected to obey the call?

In support of the judgment of the court below, I understand the leading arguments to be the two following: 1. That militia-men, when called into the service of the United States by the President's orders, communicated either to the executive magistrate or to any inferior militia officer of a state, are not to be considered as being in the service of the United States until they are mustered at the place of rendezvous. If this be so, then, 2d. The state retains a right, concurrent with the government of the United States, to punish his delinquency. It is admitted on the one side, that so long as the militia are acting under the military jurisdiction of the state to which they belong, the powers of legislation over them are concurrent in the general and state government. Congress has power to provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining them; and this power being unlimited, except in the two particulars of officering and training them, according to the discipline to be prescribed by Congress, it may be exercised to any extent that may be deemed necessary by Congress. But as state militia, 17* the power of *the state governments to legislate on the same subjects, having existed prior to the formation of the constitution, and not having been prohibited by that instrument, it remains with the states, subordinate nevertheless to the paramount law of the general government, operating upon the same subject. On the other side, it is conceded, that after a detachment of the militia have been called forth, and have entered into the service of the United States, the authority of the general government over such detachment is exclusive. This is also obvious. Over the national militia, the state governments never had, or could have, jurisdiction. None such is conferred by the constitution of the United States; consequently, none such can exist.

The first question, then, is, at what time, and under what circumstances, does a portion of militia, drafted, detached, and called forth by the President, enter into the service of the United States, and change their character from State to national militia? That Congress might by law have fixed the period, by confining it to the draft; the order given to the Chief Magistrate, or other militia officer of the state; to the arrival of the men at the place of rendezvous; or to any other circumstance, I can entertain no doubt. This would certainly be included in the more extensive powers of calling forth the militia, organizing, arming, disciplining, and governing them. But has Congress made any declaration on this subject, and in what manner is the will of that body, as expressed in the before-mentioned laws, to be construed? It 18* must be conceded that there is *no law of the United States which declares in express terms that the organizing, arming, and equipping the detachment, on the order of the President to the state militia officers, or to the militia-men personally, places them in the service of the United States. It is true that the refusal or neglect of the militia to obey the orders of the President is declared to be an offense against the United States, and subjects the offender to a certain prescribed punishment. But this flows from the power bestowed upon the general government to call them forth; and, consequently, to punish disobedience to a legal order, and by no means proves that the call of the President places the detachment in the service of the United States. But although Congress has been less explicit on this subject than they might have been, and it could be wished they had been, I am, nevertheless, of opinion, that a fair construction of the different militia laws of the United States will lead to a conclusion that something more than organizing and equipping a detachment, and ordering it into service, was considered as necessary to place the militia in the service of the United States. That preparing a detachment for such service does not place it in the service, is clearly to be collected from the various temporary laws, which have been passed, authorizing the President to require of the state executives to organize, arm, and equip their state quotas of militia for the service of the United States. Because they all provide that the requisition shall be to hold such quotas in readiness to march at a moment's warning; and some, if not all of them, authorize *the President to call into actual [*19 service any part, or the whole of said quotas, or detachments; clearly distinguishing between the orders of the President to organize and hold the detachments in readiness for service, and their entering into service.

The act of the 28th of February, 1795, declares that the militia employed in the service of the United States shall receive the same pay and allowance as the troops of the United States, and shall be subject to the same rules and articles of war. The provisions made for disabled militia-men, and for their families, in case of their death, are, by other laws, confined to such militia as are, or have been, in actual service. There are other laws which seem very strongly to indicate the time at which they are considered as being in service. Thus, the act of the 28th of February, 1795, declares, that a militiaman called into the service of the United States, shall not be compelled to serve more than three months after his arrival at the place of rendezvous, in any one year. The 8th section of the act of the 18th of April, 1814, declares, that the militia, when called into the service of the United States, if, in the President's opinion, the public interest requires it, may be compelled to serve for a term not exceeding six months, after their arrival at the place of rendezvous, in any one year; and by the 10th section, provision is made for the expenses which may be incurred by marching the militia to their places of rendezvous, in pursuance of a requisition of the President, and they are to be adjusted and paid in like manner as those incurred after their arrival at the rendezvous. *The 3d [*20 section of the act of the 2d of January, 1795, provides, that whenever the militia shall be called into the actual service of the United States, their pay shall be deemed to commence from the day of their appearing at the place of battalion, regimental or brigade rendezvous, allowing a day's pay and ration for every 15 miles from their homes to said rendezvous.

From this brief summary of the laws, it would seem that actual service was considered by Congress as the criterion of national militia; and that the service did not commence until the arrival of the militia at the place of rendezvous. That is, the terminus a quo, the service, the pay, and subjection to the articles of war, are to commence and continue. If the service, in particular, is to continue for a certain length of time, from a certain day, it would seem to follow, almost conclusively, that the service commenced on that, and not on some prior day. And, indeed, it would seem to border somewhat upon an absurdity to say that a militiaman was in the service of the United States at any time, who, so far from entering into it for a single moment, had refused to do so, and who never did any act to connect him with such service. It has already been admitted, that if Congress had pleased so to declare, a militiaman, called into the service of the United States, might have been held and considered as being constructively in that service, though not actually so; and might have been treated in like manner as if he had appeared at the place of rendezvous. But Congress has not so declared, 21*] nor have they made *any provision applicable to such a case; on the contrary, it would appear, that a fine to be paid by the delinquent militia-man was deemed an equivalent for his services, and an atonement for his disobedience.

If, then, a militia-man, called into the service of the United States, shall refuse to obey the order, and is, consequently, not to be considered as in the service of the United States, or removed from the military jurisdiction of the state to which he belongs, the next question is, is it competent to the state to provide for trying and punishing him for his disobedience, by a court-martial, deriving its authority under the state? It may be admitted at once that the militia belong to the states, respectively, in which they are enrolled, and that they are subject, both in their civil and military capacities, to the jurisdiction and laws of such state, except so far as those laws are controlled by acts of Congress constitutionally made. Congress has power to provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia; and it is presumable that the framers of the constitution contemplated a full exercise of all these powers. Nevertheless, if Congress had declined to exercise them, it was competent to the state governments to provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining their respective militia, in such manner as they might think proper. But Congress has provided for all these subjects, in the way which that body must have supposed the best calculated to promote the general welfare, and to provide for the national defense. After 22*] this, can the state governments *enter upon the same ground, provide for the same objects as they may think proper, and punish in their own way violations of the laws they have so enacted? The affirmative of this question is asserted by the defendant's counsel, who, it is understood, contend, that unless such state laws are in direct contradiction to those of the United States, they are not repugnant to the constitution of the United States.

From this doctrine, I must, for one, be permitted to dissent. The two laws may not be in such absolute opposition to each other as to render the one incapable of execution without violating the injunctions of the other; and yet, the will of the one legislature may be in direct collision with that of the other. This will is to be discovered as well by what the legislature has not declared as by what they have expressed. Congress, for example, has declared that the punishment for disobedience of the act of Congress shall be a certain fine; if that provided by the state legislature for the same offense be a similar fine, with the addition of imprisonment or death, the latter law would not prevent the former from being carried into execution, and may be said, therefore, not to be repugnant to it. But surely the will of Congress is, nevertheless, thwarted and opposed.

This question does not so much involve a contest for power between the two governments, as the rights and privileges of the citizen, secured to him by the constitution of the United States, the benefit of which he may lawfully claim.

23*] *If, in a specified case, the people have thought proper to bestow certain powers on Congress as the safest depository of them, and Congress has legislated within the scope of them, the people have reason to complain that the same powers should be exercised at the same time by the state legislatures. To subject them to the operation of two laws upon the same subject, dictated by distinct wills, particularly in a case inflicting pains and penalties, is, to my apprehension, something very much like oppression, if not worse. In short, I am altogether incapable of comprehending how two distinct wills can, at the same time, be exercised in relation to the same subject, to be effectual, and at the same time compatible with each other. If they correspond in every respect, then the latter is idle and inoperative; if they differ, they must, in the nature of things, oppose each other, so far as they do differ. If the one imposes a certain punishment for a certain offense, the presumption is, that this was deemed sufficient, and, under all circumstances the only proper one. If the other legislature impose a different punishment, in kind or degree, I am at a loss to conceive how they can both consist harmoniously together.

I admit that a legislative body may, by different laws, impose upon the same person, for the same offense, different and cumulative punishments; but then it is the will of the same body to do so, and the second, equally with the first law, is the will of that body. There is, therefore, and can be, no opposition of wills. But the case is altogether different where *the laws flow from the wills of distinct, [*24 co-ordinate bodies.

This course of reasoning is intended as an answer to what I consider a novel and unconstitutional doctrine, that in cases where the state governments have a concurrent power of legislation with the national government, they may legislate upon any subject on which Congress has acted, provided the two laws are not in terms, or in their operation, contradictory and repugnant to each other.

Upon the subject of the militia, Congress has exercised the powers conferred on that body by the constitution, as fully as was thought right, and has thus excluded the power of legislation by the states on these subjects, except so far as it has been permitted by Congress; although it should be conceded, that important provisions have been omitted, or that others which have been made might have been more extended, or more wisely devised.

There still remains another question to be considered, which more immediately involves the merits of this cause. Admit that the legislature of Pennsylvania could not constitutionally legislate in respect to delinquent militia-men, and to prescribe the punishment to which they should be subject, had the state court-martial jurisdiction over the subject, so as to enforce the laws of Congress against these delinquents?

This, it will be seen, is a different question from that which has been just examined. That respects the power of a state legislature to legislate upon a subject, on which Congress has declared its will. This concerns the jurisdiction of a state military tribunal *to adjudicate [*25 in a case which depends on a law of Congress, and to enforce it.

It has been already shown that Congress has prescribed the punishment to be inflicted on a militia-man detached and called forth, but who has refused to march; and has also provided that courts-martial for the trial of such delinquents, to be composed of militia officers only, shall be held and conducted in the manner pointed out by the rules and articles of war.

That Congress might have vested the exclusive jurisdiction in courts-martial to be held, and conducted as the laws of the United States have prescribed, will, I presume, hardly be questioned. The offense to be punished grows out of the constitution and laws of the United States, and is, therefore, clearly a case which might have been withdrawn from the concurrent jurisdiction of the state tribunals. But an exclusive jurisdiction is not given to courts-martial, deriving their authority under the national government, by express words. The question then (and I admit the difficulty of it) occurs, is this a case in which the state courts-martial could exercise jurisdiction?

Speaking upon the subject of the federal judiciary The Federalist distinctly asserts the doctrine that the United States, in the course of legislation upon the objects entrusted to their direction, may commit the decision of causes arising upon a particular regulation to the federal courts solely, if it should be deemed expedient; yet that in every case in which the state tribunals should not be expressly excluded 26* by the acts of the national legislature, they would, of course, take cognizance of the causes to which those acts might give birth.<sup>1</sup>

I can discover, I confess, nothing unreasonable in this doctrine; nor can I perceive any inconvenience which can grow out of it, so long as the power of Congress to withdraw the whole, or any part of those cases, from the jurisdiction of the state courts, is, as I think it must be, admitted.

The practice of the general government seems strongly to confirm this doctrine; for at the first session of Congress which commenced after the adoption of the constitution, the judicial system was formed; and the exclusive and concurrent jurisdiction conferred upon the courts created by that law were clearly distinguished and marked; showing that, in the opinion of that body, it was not sufficient to vest an exclusive jurisdiction, where it was deemed proper, merely by a grant of jurisdiction generally. In particular, this law grants exclusive jurisdiction to the circuit courts of all crimes and offenses cognizable under the authority of the United States, except where the laws of the United States should otherwise provide; and this will account for the proviso in the act of the 24th of February, 1807, ch. 75, concerning the forgery of the notes of the Bank of the United States, "that nothing in that act contained should be construed to deprive the courts of the individual States of jurisdiction under the laws of the several states over offenses made punishable by that act." A similar proviso is to be found in the act of the 27* 21st of April, 1806, ch. 49, concerning the counterfeiters of the current coin of the United States. It is clear that, in the opinion of Congress, this saving was necessary in order to authorize the exercise of concurrent jurisdiction by the state courts over those offenses; and there can be very little doubt but that this opinion was well founded. The judiciary act had vested in the federal courts exclusive jurisdiction of all offenses cognizable under the authority of the United States, unless where the laws of the United States should otherwise direct. The states could not, therefore, exercise a concurrent jurisdiction in those cases, without coming into direct collision with the laws of Congress. But by these savings Congress did provide that the jurisdiction of the federal courts in the specified cases should not be exclusive; and the concurrent jurisdiction of the state courts was instantly restored, so far as, under state authority, it could be exercised by them.

There are many other acts of Congress which permit jurisdiction over the offenses therein described, to be exercised by state magistrates and courts; not, I presume, because such permission was considered to be necessary under the constitution, in order to vest a concurrent jurisdiction in those tribunals; but because, without it, the jurisdiction was exclusively vested in the national courts by the judiciary act, and consequently could not be otherwise exercised by the state courts. For I hold it to be perfectly clear that Congress cannot confer jurisdiction upon any courts but such as exist under the constitution and laws of the United States, although the state courts may *28 exercise jurisdiction on cases authorized by the laws of the state, and not prohibited by the exclusive jurisdiction of the federal courts.

What, then, is the real object of the law of Pennsylvania which we are considering? I answer, to confer authority upon a state court-martial to enforce the laws of the United States against delinquent militia-men, who had disobeyed the call of the President to enter into the service of the United States; for, except the provisions for vesting this jurisdiction in such a court, this act is, in substance, a re-enactment of the acts of Congress, as to the description of the offense, the nature and extent of the punishment, and the collection and appropriation of the fines imposed.

Why might not this court-martial exercise the authority thus vested in it by this law? As to crimes and offenses against the United States, the law of Congress had vested the cognizance of them exclusively in the federal courts. The state courts, therefore, could exercise no jurisdiction whatever over such offenses, unless where, in particular cases, other laws of the United States had otherwise provided; and wherever such provision was made, the claim of exclusive jurisdiction to the particular cases was withdrawn by the United States, and the concurrent jurisdiction of the state courts was eo instanti restored, not by way of grant from the national government, but by the removal of a disability before imposed upon the state tribunals.

But military offenses are not included in the act of Congress, conferring jurisdiction upon the circuit and district courts; no person has *29 ever contended that such offenses are cognizable before the common law courts. The militia laws have, therefore, provided, that the offense of disobedience to the President's call upon the militia shall be cognizable by a court-martial of the United States; but an exclusive cognizance is not conferred upon that court, as it had been upon the common law courts as to other offenses, by the judiciary act. It follows, then, as I conceive, that jurisdiction over this offense remains to be concurrently exercised by the national and state courts-martial, since it is authorized by the laws of the state, and not prohibited by those of the United States. Where is the repugnance of the one law to the other? The jurisdiction was clearly concurrent over militia-men, not engaged in the service of the United States; and the acts of Congress have not disturbed this state of things, by asserting an exclusive jurisdiction. They certainly have not done so in terms; and I do not think that it can be made out by any fair construction of them. The act of 1795 merely declares that this offense shall be tried by a court-martial. This was clearly not exclusive; but, on the contrary, it would seem to import that such court might be held under national, or state authority.

The act of 1814 does not render the jurisdiction necessarily exclusive. It provides that courts-martial for the trial of militia, drafted and called forth, shall, when necessary, be appointed, held, and conducted, in the manner prescribed by the rules of war.

If the mere assignment of jurisdiction to a 30* particular *court does not necessarily render it exclusive, as I have already endeavored to prove, then it would follow that this law can have no such effect; unless, indeed, there is a difference in this respect between the same language, when applied to military, and to civil courts; and if there be a difference, I have not been able to perceive it. But the law uses the expression "when necessary." How is this to be understood? It may mean, I acknowledge, whenever there are delinquents to try; but, surely, if it import no more than this, it was very unnecessarily used, since it would have been sufficient to say that courts-martial for the trial of militia called into service should be formed and conducted in the manner prescribed by the law. The act of 1795 had declared who were liable to be tried, but had not said with precision before what court the trial should be had. This act describes the court; and the two laws being construed together, would seem to mean that every such delinquent as is described in the act of 1795 should pay a certain fine, to be determined and adjudged by a court-martial, to be composed of militia officers, to be appointed and conducted in the manner prescribed by the articles of war. These words, when necessary, have no definite meaning, if they are confined to the existence of cases for trial before the court. But if they be construed (as I think they ought to be) to apply to trials rendered necessary by the omission of the states to provide for state courts-martial to exercise a jurisdiction in the case, or of such courts to take cognizance of them, when so authorized, they have an important 31* and a useful *meaning. If the state court-martial proceeds to take cognizance of the cases, it may not appear necessary to the proper officer in the service of the United States to summon a court to try the same cases; if they do not, or for want of authority cannot try them, then it may be deemed necessary to convene a court-martial under the articles of war, to take and to exercise the jurisdiction.

There are two objections which were made by the plaintiff's counsel, to the exercise of jurisdiction in this case, by the state court-martial, which remain to be noticed.

1. It was contended, that if the exercise of this jurisdiction be admitted, that the sentence of the court would either oust the jurisdiction of the United States court-martial or might subject the accused to be twice tried for the same offense. To this I answer, that, if the jurisdiction of the two courts be concurrent, the sentence of either court, either of conviction or acquittal, might be pleaded in bar of the prosecution before the other, as much so as the judgment of a state court, in a civil case of concurrent jurisdiction, may be pleaded in bar of an action for the same cause, instituted in a circuit court of the United States.

Another objection is, that if the state court-martial had authority to try these men, the governor of that state, in case of conviction, might have pardoned them. I am by no means satisfied that he could have done so; but if he could, this would only furnish a reason why Congress should vest the jurisdiction in these cases exclusively in a court-martial acting under the authority of the United States.

*Upon the whole, I am of opinion, after [32] the most laborious examination of this delicate question, that the state court-martial had a concurrent jurisdiction with the tribunal pointed out by the acts of Congress to try a militia-man who had disobeyed the call of the President, and to enforce the laws of Congress against such delinquent; and that this authority will remain to be so exercised until it shall please Congress to vest it exclusively elsewhere, or until the state of Pennsylvania shall withdraw from their court-martial the authority to take such jurisdiction. At all events, this is not one of those clear cases of repugnance to the constitution of the United States where I should feel myself at liberty to declare the law to be unconstitutional; the sentence of the court coram non judice, and the judgment of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania erroneous on these grounds.

Two of the judges are of opinion that the law in question is unconstitutional, and that the judgment below ought to be reversed.

The other judges are of opinion that the judgment ought to be affirmed; but they do not concur in all respects in the reasons which influence my opinion.

Mr. Justice JOHNSON. It is not very easy to form a distinct idea of what the question in this case really is. An individual having offended against a law of his own state, has been cited before a court constituted under the laws of that state, and there convicted and fined. His complaint is, that his offense was an *offense against the laws of the United [33] States, that he is liable to be punished under those laws, and cannot, therefore, be constitutionally punished under the laws of his own state.

If any right secured to him under the state constitution has been violated, it is not our affair. His complaint before this court must be either that some law or some constitutional provision of the United States, has been violated in this instance; or he must seek elsewhere for redress. This court can relieve him only upon the supposition that the state law under which he has been fined is inconsistent with some right secured to him, or secured to the United States, under the constitution. Now, the United States complain of nothing; the act of Pennsylvania was a candid, spontaneous, ancillary effort in the service of the United States; and all the plaintiff in error has to complain of is, that he has been punished by a state law, when he ought to have been punished under a law of the United States, which he contends he has violated.

I really have not been able to satisfy myself that it is any case at all for the cognizance of this court; but from respect for the opinion of others, I will proceed to make some remarks on the questions which have been raised in the argument.

Why may not the same offense be made punishable both under the laws of the states and of the United States? Every citizen of a state owes a double allegiance; he enjoys the protection and participates in the government of both the state and the United States. It is 34* obvious that in those cases in which the United States may exercise the right of exclusive legislation it will rest with Congress to determine whether the general government shall exercise the right of punishing exclusively, or leave the states at liberty to exercise their own discretion. But where the United States cannot assume, or where they have not assumed, this exclusive exercise of power, I cannot imagine a reason why the states may not also, if they feel themselves injured by the same offense, assert their right of inflicting punishment also. In cases affecting life or member, there is an express restraint upon the exercise of the punishing power. But it is a restriction which operates equally upon both governments; and according to a very familiar principle of construction, this exception would seem to establish the existence of the general right. The actual exercise of this concurrent right of punishing is familiar to every day's practice. The laws of the United States have made many offenses punishable in their courts which were and still continue punishable under the laws of the states. Witness the case of counterfeiting the current coin of the United States, under the act of April 21st, 1806, in which the state right of punishing is expressly recognized and preserved. Witness also the crime of robbing the mail on the highway, which is unquestionably cognizable as highway-robbery under the state laws, although made punishable under those of the United States.

With regard to militia-men ordered into service, there exists a peculiar propriety in leaving them subject to the coercive regulations of 35* both governments. *The safety of each is so worked up with that of all the states, and the honor and peculiar safety of a particular state may so often be dependent upon the alacrity with which her citizens repair to the field, that the most serious mortifications and evils might result from refusing the right of lending the strength of the state authority to quicken their obedience to the calls of the United States.

But, it is contended, if the states can at all legislate or adjudicate on the subject, they may affect to aid, when their real object is nothing less than to embarrass the progress of the general government.

I acknowledge myself at a loss to imagine how this could ever be successfully attempted. Opposition, whether disguised or real, is the same thing. It is true, if we could admit that an acquittal in the state courts could be pleaded in bar to a prosecution in the courts of the United States, the evil might occur. But this is a doctrine which can only be maintained on the ground that an offense against the laws of the one government, is an offense against the other government; and can surely never be successfully asserted in any instances but those in which jurisdiction is vested in the state courts by statutory provisions of the United States. In contracts, the law is otherwise. The decision of any court of competent jurisdiction is final, whatever be the government that gives existence to the court. But crimes against a government are only cognizable in its own courts, or in those which derive their right of holding jurisdiction from the offended government.

*Yet, were it otherwise, I cannot perceive with what correctness we can, from the possible abuse of a power, reason away the actual possession of it in the states. Such considerations were only proper for the ears of those who established the actual distribution of powers between the states and the United States. The absurdities that might grow out of an affected co-operation in the states, with a real view to produce embarrassment, furnish the best guaranty against the probability of its ever being attempted, and the surest means of detecting and defeating it. We may declare defects in the constitution, without being justly chargeable with creating them; but if they exist, it is not for us to correct them. In the present instance, I believe the danger imaginary, and if it is not, it must pass ad alium examen.

But whatever be the views entertained on this question, I am perfectly satisfied that the individual in this case was not amenable to any law of the United States. Both that there was no law of the United States that reached his case, and that there was nothing done or intended to be done by the government of the United States, to bring him within their laws, before he reached the place of rendezvous.

It is obvious that there are two ways by which the militia may be called into service; the one is under state authority, the other under authority of the United States. The power of Congress over the militia is limited but by two reservations in favor of the states—viz., the right of officering and that of training them. When distributed by the states under their own officers the general government have the right, if they choose to exercise it, of 37* designating both the officer and private who shall serve, and to call him forth or punish him for not coming. But the possession of this power, or even the passing of laws in the exercise of it, does not preclude the general government from leaning upon the state authority, if they think proper, for the purpose of calling the militia into service. They may command or request; and in the case before us, they obviously confined themselves to the latter mode. Indeed, extensive as their power over the militia is, the United States are obviously intended to be made in some measure dependent upon the states for the aid of this species of force. For, if the states will not officer or train their men; there is no power given to Congress to supply the deficiency.

The method of calling forth the militia by requisition is, it is believed, the only one hitherto resorted to in any instance. Being partially dependent upon the integrity of the states, the general government has hitherto been satisfied to rest wholly on that integrity, and, except in very few instances, has never been disappointed. The compulsory power has been in its practice held in reserve, as only intended for use when the other shall fail. Historically it is known that the act of 1795 was passed with a view to a state of things then existing in the interior of Pennsylvania, when it became probable that the President of the United States would have to exert the authority of the general government immediately on detached portions of the officers or militia of the Union, to aid in the execution of the laws 38*] of *the United States. And instances may still occur in which the exercise of that power may become necessary for the same purpose. But, whenever bodies of militia have been called forth for the purposes of general defense, it is believed, that in no instance has it been done otherwise than by requisition, the only mode practiced toward the states from the commencement of the revolution to the present day. That it was the mode intended to be pursued in this case, is obvious from the perusal of the letter of the Secretary of War to the Governor of Pennsylvania.<sup>1</sup> The words made 39*] use of are: "The President *has deemed it advisable to invite the executives of certain states to organize," &c. Words which no military man would construe into a military command.

It is true that this letter also refers to the acts of 1795 and 1814, as the authority under which the requisition is made, and the act of 1795 authorizes the President to issue his order for that purpose; but this makes no difference in the case; it only leaves him the power of proceeding by order if he thinks proper, without enjoining that mode, or depriving him of the option to pursue the other mode as long as the principles upon which the states acted were such as to render it advisable. Or, if the construction be otherwise, the result only will be that the President has not pursued the mode pointed out by that act, and, therefore, has not brought the case within it.

But suppose the letter of the Secretary of War was intended by him to operate as an order (although I cannot believe that Congress ever intended an order should issue immediately to the governor of a *state), how is this [*40] individual made punishable under the acts of 1795 and 1814?

The doctrine must be admitted, that Congress might, if they thought proper, have authorized the issuing of the President's order even to the Governor. For when the constitution of Pennsylvania makes her Governor commander-in-chief of the militia, it must subject him in that capacity (at least when in actual service) to the orders of him who is made commander-in-chief of all the militia of the Union. Yet if he is to be addressed in that capacity, and not as the general organ or representative of the state sovereignty, surely he has a right to be apprised of it. But is he, then, to be charged as a delinquent? Where is the law that has provided, or can provide, a court-martial for his trial? And where is the law that would oblige him to consider such a letter as this a military order? It would then seem somewhat strange, if he, to whom this letter was immediately addressed, received no order from the President, that one to whom his order was transmitted through fifty grades, should yet be adjudged to have disobeyed the President's order.

But the situation of the private in this case is still more favorable. It must be recollected we are now construing a penal statute; and the criminality of the person charged depends altogether on the 5th section of the act of 1795. The 1st section of the act of 1814 makes no difference in this particular, inasmuch as it does no more than create a tribunal for the trial of crimes, and supposes the commission of such crimes to be against the provisions of some existing law. The command of the President, then, *I hold to have been indispensable [*41] to the creation of an offense under the 5th section of this act. But how the President could, in the actual state of things, have issued such a command to the private, consistently with the provisions of this act, it is not easy to show. For, by the section immediately preceding the 5th, it is provided, "That no officer, non-commissioned officer, or private of the militia, shall be compelled to serve more than three months, after his arrival at the place of rendezvous, in any one year, nor more than in due rotation with 1.—Letter from the Secretary of War, to the Governor of Pennsylvania.

"WAR DEPARTMENT, July 4, 1814.

"SIR: The late pacification in Europe offers to the enemy a large disposable force, both naval and military, and with it the means of giving to the war here a character of new and increased activity and extent.

"Without knowing, with certainty, that such will be its application, and still less that any particular point or points will become objects of attack; the President has deemed it advisable, as a measure of precaution, to strengthen ourselves on the line of the Atlantic; and (as the principal means of doing this will be found in the militia) to invite the executives of certain states to organize and hold in readiness for immediate service a corps of ninety-three thousand five hundred men, under the laws of the 28th of February, 1795, and the 18th of April, 1814.

"The inclosed detail will show your Excellency what, under this requisition, will be the quota of Pennsylvania. As far as volunteer uniform companies can be found, they will be preferred. The expediency of regarding (as well in the designations of the militia as of their places of rendezvous) the points, the importance or exposure of which will be most likely to attract the views of the enemy, need but be suggested.

"A report of the organization of your quota, when completed, and of its place or places of rendezvous, will be acceptable.

"P. S.—The points to be defended, by the quota from Pennsylvania, will be the shores of the Delaware, Baltimore, and this city."

every other able-bodied man of the same rank in the battalion to which he belongs." Now, what was meant by due rotation? and how was the President's order to reach the individual without previously establishing this due rotation? I admit that this rotation may have been established through the aid of a state law; but it became indispensable that such law should have been authorized or adopted by some law of Congress; and there exists no law that I know of, either authorizing or requiring the designation or distribution by the states, which this law contemplates. On a call of the whole militia, there would have been no difficulty; but in the case of a partial call, some designation legally known to the President became indispensable, before he could issue his orders with that precision which may well be required in a criminal prosecution. And this probably operated as forcibly as considerations of comity, in determining the government to proceed by the ancient mode of requisition, instead of addressing the executive of Pennsylvania in the language of command and authority; *if, indeed (what I will not readily admit), the act was ever intended to apply to the case of an immediate order to the executive.

Pursuing the same course of reasoning a little further, we shall also be led to the conclusion that neither could there be a court constituted by a law of the United States for the trial of this offender. I hold it unquestionable that whenever, in the statutes of any government, a general reference is made to law, either implicitly or expressly, that it can only relate to the laws of the government making this reference. Now, the only act which it is pretended vests any court with jurisdiction of offenses created by the 5th section of the act of 1795, as to persons not yet mustered into service, is the 1st section of the act of 1814. The 4th and 6th sections of the act of 1795, taken together, furnish courts-martial for the trial of offenses committed by militia employed by the United States; and the act of 1814, I admit, was intended to act upon the offenses of those who were not yet in actual service, but had been called into service. Can it, on any legal principle, be so construed as to answer the end proposed? The words are, "That courts-martial for the trial of militia, drafted, detached and called forth for the service of the United States, shall be appointed," &c. But how drafted, detached, and called forth? Under the laws of the United States, or of Russia? For the laws of the states, unless adopted by Congress, are no more the laws of the United States than those of any foreign power. There is nothing in this act, or any other act, that designates the drafting, and detaching, or 43 *calling forth, there expressed as the grounds of jurisdiction, as a drafting, &c., under the laws of a state. Nor would it have had such a drafting, &c., in view, if it was intended to provide for punishing offenses against the provisions of the act of 1795; for, in that act it is required to be a calling forth by the President, not by state authority. And this suggests the only reasonable exposition that can be given it, consistent with the principle, that it must be a drafting, detaching, and calling forth under laws of the United States. If Wheat. 5.

we can find a sensible and consistent exposition, we are bound to adopt it as the only one intended.

I have no doubt, that under the powers given the President by the act of 1795, and under the restriction contained in the 4th section of that act, it was in the power of the President to have issued orders to the Adjutant-General of Pennsylvania, to bring into the field this quota of militia, and to have prescribed the manner in which they should be drafted and detached; and had this been done, everything would have been sensible and consistent, and the exigencies of both these laws would have been satisfied. It is obvious that the act of 1814 recognizes the construction which makes the drafting and detaching, as necessary to precede the calling forth; and if the power to call forth existed in the President alone, it would seem that the other subordinate, but necessary ancillary powers to which this act has relation, must have existed in him also, and could be exercised by him, or under his authority only. Under this view of the subject, I am of *opinion that a court-martial constituted [*44 under this act of April 18th, 1814, could not legally have tried this individual, because he was not drafted and detached under the meaning of that act, taken in connection with the act of 1795. Neither, in my opinion, was the calling forth such as was in the contemplation of that act. In addition to the reasons already given for this opinion, exists this obvious consideration. The calling forth authorized by that act is to be expressed by an order from the President. It is disobedience to such an order alone that is made punishable by that act. Now, though it be unquestionable that this order may be communicated through any proper organ, yet it must be communicated to the individual as an order from the President, or he is not brought within the enactment of the law, nor put on his guard against incurring the penalty. But, from first to last, the whole case makes out an offense against the orders of the Governor of Pennsylvania. It does not appear that the order communicated to the individual was made to assume the form of an order from the President; and how, in that case, he could have been held guilty of having violated an order from the President, it is not easy to conceive.

For these reasons I am very clearly of opinion that neither the United States nor the plaintiff in error can complain of the infraction of any constitutional right, if the state did constitute a court for trying offenses against the laws of the United States, or ingraft those laws into its own code, and make offenses against the United States punishable in its courts; that if the individual has any cause of complaint, *it is between him and his [*45 own state government. And that even were it otherwise, the plaintiff in error does not make out such a case here; inasmuch as the general government could not have had it in contemplation to bring into operation the penal provisions of the act of 1795, and if they had, that they did not pursue the steps indispensable for that purpose; therefore, that the court-martial by which the plaintiff in error was tried, was really acting wholly under the authority of state laws, punishing state offenses.

But it is contended, that if the states do possess this power over the militia, they may abuse it. This is a branch of the exploded doctrine that within the scope in which Congress may legislate the states shall not legislate. That they cannot, when legislating within that ceded region of power, run counter to the laws of Congress, is denied by no one; but, as I before observed, to reason against the exercise of this power from the possible abuse of it, is not for a court of justice. When instances of this opposition occur, it will be time enough to meet them. The present was an instance of the most honorable and zealous co-operation with the general government. The legislature of Pennsylvania, influenced, no doubt, by views similar to those in which I have presented the subject, saw the defects in the means of coercing her citizens into the service; and, unwilling to bear the imputation of lukewarmness in the common cause, legislated on the occasion just as far as the laws of the United States were defective, or not brought into operation. And to vindicate her disinterestedness, she even 46*] gratuitously *surrenders to the United States the fines to be inflicted. To have paused on legal subtleties with the enemy at her door, or to have shrunk from duty under shelter of pretexts which she could remove, would have been equally inconsistent with her character for wisdom and for candor.

I will make one further observation in order to prevent myself from being misunderstood. I have observed that the governors of states, as military commanders, must be considered as subordinate to the President. I do not mean to intimate, nor have I the least idea, that the act of 1795 gives authority to the President to issue an order to a governor in that capacity. I hold the opinion to be absurd; for he comes not within the idea of a militia officer in the language of that act. If he is so, what is his grade? He will not be included under any title of rank, known to the laws of the United States, from the highest to the lowest. And how is he to be tried? What is his pay? what his punishment? An act which authorizes an order for militia, obviously authorizes a requisition. And if the purposes of the general government could as well be subserved by depending on the state authority for calling out the militia, there was no reason against resorting to that authority for the purpose. But the power of ordering out the militia is an alternative given to the President when the other is too circuitous or likely to fail. In that case, the President may address himself to the executive; and having obtained through him the necessary information relative to the distribution and organization of the militia, may pro- 47*] ceed, *under his own immediate orders, to draft and detach the numbers wanted. And thus everything in the act become sensible, consistent, and adequate to the purposes in view, with the sole defect intended to have been remedied by the 1st section of the act of 1814.

In this case, it will be observed that there is no point whatever decided, except that the fine was constitutionally imposed upon the plaintiff in error. The course of reasoning by which the judges have reached this conclusion are various, coinciding in but one thing, viz., that there is no error in the judgment of the state court of Pennsylvania.

Mr. Justice STORY. The only question which is cognizable by this court upon this voluminous record, arises from a very short paragraph in the close of the bill of exceptions. It there appears that the plaintiff prayed the State Court of Common Pleas to instruct the jury, that the first, second and third paragraphs of the 21st section of the statute of Pennsylvania of the 28th of March, 1814, "so far as they related to the militia called into the service of the United States, under the laws of Congress, and who failed to obey the orders of the President of the United States, are contrary to the constitution of the United States and the laws of Congress made in pursuance thereof, and, are, therefore, null and void." The court instructed the jury that these paragraphs were not contrary to the constitution or laws of the United States, and were, therefore, not null and void. This opinion has been *affirmed [48 by the highest state tribunal of Pennsylvania, and judgment has been there pronounced in pursuance of it in favor of the defendant. The cause stands before us upon a writ of error from this last judgment; and the naked question for us to decide is, whether the paragraphs alluded to are repugnant to the constitution or laws of the United States; if so, the judgment must be reversed; if otherwise, it ought to be affirmed.

Questions of this nature are always of great importance and delicacy. They involve interests of so much magnitude, and of such deep and permanent public concern, that they cannot but be approached with uncommon anxiety. The sovereignty of a state in the exercise of its legislation is not to be impaired, unless it be clear that it has transcended its legitimate authority; nor ought any power to be sought, much less to be adjudged, in favor of the United States, unless it be clearly within the reach of its constitutional charter. Sitting here, we are not at liberty to add one jot of power to the national government beyond what the people have granted by the constitution; and, on the other hand, we are bound to support that constitution as it stands, and to give a fair and rational scope to all the powers which it clearly contains.

The constitution containing a grant of powers in many instances similar to those already existing in the state governments, and some of these being of vital importance also to state authority and state legislation, it is not to be admitted that a mere grant of such powers in affirmative terms to Congress, does, **per se*, [49 transfer an exclusive sovereignty on such subjects to the latter. On the contrary, a reasonable interpretation of that instrument necessarily leads to the conclusion that the powers so granted are never exclusive of similar powers existing in the states, unless where the constitution has expressly, in terms, given an exclusive power to Congress, or the exercise of a like power is prohibited to the states, or there is a direct repugnancy or incompatibility in the exercise of it by the states. The example of the first class is to be found in the exclusive legislation delegated to Congress over places purchased by the consent of the legislature of the state in which the same shall be, for forts, arsenals, dock-yards, &c.; of the second class, the prohibition of a state to coin money or emit bills of credit; of the third class, as this court have already held, the power to establish an uniform rule of naturalization,<sup>1</sup> and the delegation of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction.<sup>2</sup> In all other cases not falling within the classes already mentioned, it seems unquestionable that the states retain concurrent authority with Congress, not only upon the letter and spirit of the eleventh amendment of the constitution, but upon the soundest principles of general reasoning. There is this reserve, however, that in cases of concurrent authority, where the laws of the states and of the Union are in direct and manifest collision on the same subject, those of the Union being "the supreme law of the land," are of paramount authority, and the state laws, so far, and so far only, as such incompatibility exists, must necessarily yield.

Such are the general principles by which my judgment is guided in every investigation on constitutional points. I do not know that they have ever been seriously doubted. They commend themselves by their intrinsic equity, and have been amply justified by the opinions of the great men under whose guidance the constitution was framed, as well as by the practice of the government of the Union. To desert them would be to deliver ourselves over to endless doubts and difficulties; and probably to hazard the existence of the constitution itself. With these principles in view, let the question now before the court be examined.

The constitution declares that Congress shall have power "to provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions;" and "to provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia, and for governing such part of them as may be employed in the service of the United States, reserving to the states respectively the appointment of the officers, and the authority of training the militia according to the discipline prescribed by Congress."

It is almost too plain for argument, that the power here given to Congress over the militia is of a limited nature, and confined to the objects specified in these clauses; and that in all other respects, and for all other purposes, the militia are subject to the control and government of the state authorities. Nor can the reservation to the states of the appointment of the officers and authority of the training the militia according to the discipline prescribed by Congress, be justly considered as weakening this conclusion. That reservation constitutes an exception merely from the power given to Congress "to provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia"; and is a limitation upon the authority, which would otherwise have devolved upon it as to the appointment of officers. But the exception from a given power cannot, upon any fair reasoning, be considered as an enumeration of all the powers which belong to the states over the militia. What those powers are must depend upon their own constitution; and what is not taken away by the constitution of the United States, must be considered as retained by the states or the people. The exception, then, ascertains only that Congress have not, and that the states have, the power to appoint the officers of the militia, and to train them according to the discipline prescribed by Congress. Nor does it seem necessary to contend that the power "to provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia" is exclusively vested in Congress. It is merely an affirmative power, and if not in its own nature incompatible with the existence of a like power in the states, it may well leave a concurrent power in the latter. But when once Congress has carried this power into effect, its laws for the organization, arming, and discipline of the militia, are the supreme law of the land; and all interfering state regulations must necessarily be suspended in their operation. It would certainly seem reasonable, that in the absence of all interfering provisions by Congress on the subject, the states should have authority to organize, arm, and discipline their own militia. The general authority retained by them over the militia would seem to draw after it these, as necessary incidents. If Congress should not have exercised its own power, how, upon any other construction than that of a concurrent power, could the states sufficiently provide for their own safety against domestic insurrections, or the sudden invasion of a foreign enemy? They are expressly prohibited from keeping troops or ships of war in time of peace; and this, undoubtedly, upon the supposition, that in such cases the militia would be their natural and sufficient defense. Yet what would the militia be without organization, arms, and discipline? It is certainly not compulsory upon Congress to exercise its own authority upon this subject. The time, the mode, and the extent, must rest upon its means and sound discretion. If, therefore, the present case turned upon the question, whether a state might organize, arm, and discipline its own militia in the absence of, or subordinate to, the regulations of Congress, I am certainly not prepared to deny the legitimacy of such an exercise of authority. It does not seem repugnant in its nature to the grant of a like paramount authority to Congress; and if not, then it is retained by the states. The fifth amendment to the constitution, declaring that "a well-regulated militia being necessary to the security of a free state, the right of the people to keep and bear arms shall not be infringed," may not, perhaps, be thought to have any important bearing on this point. If it have, it confirms and illustrates, rather than impugns, the reasoning already suggested.

But Congress have also the power to provide "for governing such part of the militia as may be employed in the service of the United States." It has not been attempted in argument to establish that this power is not exclusively in Congress, or that the states have a concurrent power of governing their own militia when in the service of the Union. On the contrary, the reverse has been conceded both here and before the other tribunals, in which this cause has been so ably and learnedly discussed. And there certainly are the strongest reasons for this construction. When the militia is called into the actual service of the United States, by which I understand actual employment in service, the constitution declares that the President shall be the commander-in-chief. The militia of several states may, at the same time, be called out for the public defense; and to suppose each state could have an authority to govern its own militia in such cases, even subordinate to the regulations of Congress, seems utterly inconsistent with that unity of command and action on which the success of all military operations must essentially depend. There never could be a stronger case put from the argument of public inconvenience, against the adoption of such a doctrine. It is scarcely possible that any interference, however small, of a state under such circumstances in the government of the militia, would not materially embarrass, and directly, or indirectly, impugn the authority of the Union. In most cases there would be an utter 54* repugnancy. *It would seem, therefore, that a rational interpretation must construe this power as exclusive in its own nature, and belonging solely to Congress.

The remaining clause gives Congress power "to provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions." Does this clause vest in Congress an exclusive power, or leave to the states a concurrent power to enact laws for the same purposes? This is an important question, bearing directly on the case before us, and deserves serious deliberation. The plaintiff contends that the power is exclusive in Congress; the defendant, that it is not.

In considering this question, it is always to be kept in view that the case is not of a new power granted to Congress where no similar power already existed in the states. On the contrary, the states, in virtue of their sovereignty, possessed general authority over their own militia; and the constitution carved out of that a specific power in certain enumerated cases. But the grant of such a power is not necessarily exclusive, unless the retaining of a concurrent power by the states be clearly repugnant to the grant. It does not strike me that there is any repugnancy in such concurrent power in the states. Why may not a state call forth its own militia in aid of the United States, to execute the laws of the Union, or suppress insurrections, or repel invasions? It would certainly seem fit that a state might so do, where the insurrection or invasion is within its own territory, and directed against its own existence or authority; and yet these are cases to which the 55* power of Congress pointedly applies. And the execution of the laws of the Union within its territory may not be less vital to its rights and authority than the suppression of a rebellion, or the repulse of an enemy. I do not say that a state may call forth, or claim under its own command, that portion of its militia which the United States have already called forth, and hold employed in actual service. There would be a repugnancy in the exercise of such an authority under such circumstances. But why may it not call forth, and employ the rest of its militia in aid of the United States, for the constitutional purposes? It could not clash with the exercise of the authority confided to Congress; and yet that it must necessarily clash with it in all cases, is the sole ground upon which the authority of Congress can be deemed exclusive. I am not prepared to assert that a concurrent power is not retained by the states to provide for the calling forth its own militia as auxiliary to the power of Congress in the enumerated cases. The argument of the plaintiff is, that when a power is granted to Congress to legislate in specific cases, for purposes growing out of the Union, the natural conclusion is, that the power is designed to be exclusive; that the power is to be exercised for the good of the whole, by the will of the whole, and consistent with the interests of the whole; and that these objects can nowhere be so clearly seen, or so thoroughly weighed as in Congress, where the whole nation is represented. But the argument proves too much; and pursued to its full extent, it would establish that all the powers granted to Congress are *exclusive, un- [*56] less where concurrent authority is expressly reserved to the states. But assuming the states to possess a concurrent power on this subject, still the principal difficulty remains to be considered. It is conceded on all sides, and is, indeed, beyond all reasonable doubt, that all state laws on this subject are subordinate to those constitutionally enacted by Congress, and that if there be any conflict or repugnancy between them, the state laws to that extent are inoperative and void. And this brings us to a consideration of the actual legislation of Congress, and of Pennsylvania, as to the point in controversy.

In the execution of the power to provide for the calling forth of the militia, it cannot well be denied that Congress may pass laws to make its call effectual, to punish disobedience to its call, to erect tribunals for the trial of offenders, and to direct the modes of proceeding to enforce the penalties attached to such disobedience. In its very essence, too, the offense created by such laws must be an offense exclusively against the United States, since it grows solely out of the breach of duties due to the United States, in virtue of its positive legislation. To deny the authority of Congress to legislate to this extent, would be to deny that it had authority to make all laws necessary and proper to carry a given power into execution; to require the end, and yet deny the only means adequate to attain that end. Such a construction of the constitution is wholly inadmissible.

The authority of Congress being then unquestionable, let us see to what extent and in what *manner it has been exercised. By [*57] the act of the 28th of February, 1795, ch. 101, Congress have provided for the calling forth of the militia in the cases enumerated in the constitution. The first section provides, "that whenever the United States shall be invaded, or be in imminent danger of invasion from any foreign nation, or Indian tribe, it shall be lawful for the President of the United States to call forth such number of the militia of the state or states, most convenient to the place of danger, or scene of action, as he may judge necessary to repel such invasion, and to issue his orders for that purpose to such officer or officers of the militia as he shall think proper." It then proceeds to make a provision, substantially the same, in cases of domestic insurrections; and in like manner, the second section proceeds to provide for cases where the execution of the laws is opposed or obstructed by combinations too powerful to be suppressed by the ordinary course of judicial proceedings. The fourth section provides, that "the militia employed in the service of the United States shall be subject to the same rules and articles of war as the troops of the United States." The fifth section (which is very material to our present purpose) provides, "that every officer, non-commissioned officer, or private of the militia, who shall fail to obey any of the orders of the President of the United States, in the cases before recited, shall forfeit a sum not exceeding one year's pay, and not less than one month's pay, to be determined and adjudged by a court-martial; and such officer shall, moreover, be liable to be cashiered by a sentence of a court-martial, and be incapacitated from holding a commission in the militia for a term not exceeding twelve months, at the discretion of the said court; and such non-commissioned officers and privates shall be liable to be imprisoned by a like sentence, on failure of payment of the fines adjudged against them, for one calendar month for every five dollars of such fine." The sixth section declares, "that courts-martial for the trial of militia, shall be composed of militia officers only." The seventh and eighth sections provide for the collection of the fines by the marshal and deputies, and for the payment of them when collected into the treasury of the United States.

The 2d section of the militia act of Pennsylvania, passed the 28th of March, 1814, provides, "that if any commissioned officer of the militia shall have neglected, or refused to serve, when called into actual service in pursuance of any order or requisition of the President of the United States, he shall be liable to the penalties defined in the act of Congress of the United States, passed on the 28th of February, 1795," and then proceeds to enumerate them; and then declares, "that each and every non-commissioned officer and private, who shall have neglected or refused to serve when called into actual service in pursuance of an order or requisition of the President of the United States, shall be liable to the penalties defined in the same act," and then proceeds to enumerate them. And to each clause is added, "or shall be liable to any penalty which may have been prescribed since the date of the passage of the said act, or which may hereafter be prescribed by any law of the United States." It then further provides, that "within one month after the expiration of the time for which any detachment of militia shall have been called into the service of the United States, by, or in pursuance of orders from the President of the United States, the proper brigade inspector shall summon a general, or a regimental court-martial, as the case may be, for the trial of such person or persons belonging to the detachment called out, who shall have refused or neglected to march therewith, or to furnish a sufficient substitute, or who, after having marched therewith, shall have returned without leave from his commanding officer, of which delinquents, the proper brigade inspector shall furnish to the said court-martial an accurate list. And as soon as the said court-martial shall have decided in each of the cases which shall be submitted to their consideration, the president thereof shall furnish to the marshal of the United States, or to his deputy, and also to the comptroller of the treasury of the United States, a list of the delinquents fined, in order that the further proceedings directed to be had thereon by the laws of the United States may be completed."

It is apparent, from this summary, that each of the acts in question has in view the same objects—the punishment of any persons belonging to the militia of the state, who shall be called forth into the service of the United States by the President, and refuse to perform their duty. Both inflict the same penalties for the same acts of disobedience. In the act of 1795, it is the failure "to obey the orders of the President in any of the cases before recited;" and those orders are such as he is authorized to give by the first and second sections of the act, viz., to "call forth" the militia to execute the laws, to suppress insurrections and repel invasions. In the act of Pennsylvania, it is the neglect or refusal "to serve when called into actual service, in pursuance of any orders of the President," which orders can only be under the act of 1795. And to demonstrate this construction more fully, the delinquent is made liable to the penalties defined in the same act; and this, again, is followed by a clause varying the penalties so as to conform to those which from time to time may be inflicted by the laws of the United States for the same offense. So that there can be no reasonable doubt that the legislature of Pennsylvania meant to punish by its own courts-martial an offense against the United States created by their laws, by a substantial re-enactment of those laws in its own militia code.

No doubt has been here breathed of the constitutionality of the provisions of the act of 1795, and they are believed to be, in all respects, within the legitimate authority of Congress. In the construction, however, of this act, the parties are at variance. The plaintiff contends, that from the time of the calling forth of the militia by the President, it is to be considered as ipso facto "employed in the service of the United States," within the meaning of the constitution, and the act of 1795; and, therefore, to be exclusively governed by Congress. On the other hand, the defendant contends, that there is no distinction between the "calling forth," and the "employment in service" of the militia, in the act of 1795, both meaning actual mustering in service, or an effectual calling into service; that the states retain complete authority over the militia, notwithstanding the call of the President, until it is obeyed by going into service; that the exclusive authority of the United States does not commence until the drafted troops are mustered, and in the actual pay and service of the Union; and further, that the act of 1795 was never intended, by its language, to apply its penalties, except to militia in the latter predicament, leaving disobedience to the President's call to be punished by the states as an offense against state authority.

Upon the most mature reflection, it is my opinion that there is a sound distinction between the "calling forth" of the militia, and their being in the "actual service" or "employment" of the United States, contemplated both in the constitution and acts of Congress. The constitution, in the clause already adverted to, enables Congress to provide for the government of such part of the militia "as may be employed in the service of the United States," and makes the President commander-in-chief of the militia, "when called into the actual service of the United States." If the former clause included the authority in Congress to call forth the militia, as being in virtue of the call of the President in actual service, there would certainly be no necessity for a distinct clause, authorizing it to provide for the calling forth of the militia; and the President would be commander-in-chief, not merely of the militia in actual service, but of the militia ordered 62* into service. *The acts of Congress, also, aid the construction already asserted. The 4th section of the act of 1795 makes the militia "employed in the service of the United States" subject to the rules and articles of war; and these articles include capital punishments by courts-martial. Yet one of the amendments (art. 5) to "the constitution prohibits such punishments, "unless on a presentment or indictment of a grand jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces," or in "the militia when in actual service, in time of war, or public danger." To prevent, therefore, a manifest breach of the constitution, we cannot but suppose that Congress meant (what, indeed, its language clearly imports), in the 4th section, to provide only for cases of actual employment. The act of the 2d of January, 1795, ch. 74, provides for the pay of the militia "when called into actual service," commencing it on the day of their appearance at the place of rendezvous, and allowing a certain pay for every fifteen miles travel from their homes to that place. The 97th article of the rules and articles of war (act of 10th of April, 1806, ch. 20) declares, that the officers and soldiers of any troops, whether militia or others, being mustered, and in the pay of the United States, shall, at all times, and in all places, "when joined, or acting in conjunction with the regular forces" of the United States, be governed by these articles, and shall be subject to be tried by courts-martial, in like manner with the officers and soldiers in the regular forces, save only that such courts-martial shall be composed entirely of militia officers. And the act of the 63* 18th of *April, 1814, ch. 141, supplementary to that of 1795, provides for like courts-martial for the trial of militia, drafted, detached, and called forth for the service of the United States, "whether acting in conjunction with the regular forces or otherwise." All these provisions for the government, payment, and trial of the militia, manifestly contemplate that the militia are in actual employment and service, and not merely that they have been "called forth," or ordered forth, and had failed to obey the orders of the President. It would seem almost absurd to say that these men who have performed no actual service are yet to receive pay; that they are "employed" when they refuse to be employed in the public service; that they are "acting" in conjunction with the regular forces or otherwise, when they are not embodied to act at all; or that they are subject to the rules and articles of war as troops organized and employed in the public service, when they have utterly disclaimed all military organization and obedience. In my judgment, there are the strongest reasons to believe, that by employment "in the service," or, as it is sometimes expressed, "in the actual service" of the United States, something more must be meant than a mere calling forth of the militia. That it includes some acts of organization, mustering, or marching done or recognized, in obedience to the call in the public service. The act of 1795 is not in its terms compulsive upon any militia to serve, but contemplates an option in the person drafted, to serve or not to serve; and if he pay the penalty inflicted *by the [64 law, he does not seem bound to perform any military duties.

Besides, the terms "call forth" and "employed in service," cannot, in any appropriate sense, be said to be synonymous. To suppose them used to signify the same thing in the constitution, and acts of Congress, would be to defeat the obvious purposes of both. The constitution, in providing for the calling forth of the militia, necessarily supposes some act to be done before the actual employment of the militia; a requisition to perform service, a call to engage in a public duty. From the very nature of things, the call must precede the service; and to confound them is to break down the established meaning of language, and to render nugatory a power without which the militia can never be compelled to serve in defense of the Union. For of what constitutional validity can the act of 1795 be, if the sense be not what I have stated? If Congress cannot provide for a preliminary call, authorizing and requiring the service, how can it punish disobedience to that call? The argument that endeavors to establish such a proposition is utterly without any solid foundation. We do not sit here to fritter away the constitution upon metaphysical subtleties.

Nor is it true that the act of 1795 confines its penalties to such of the militia as are in actual service, leaving those who refuse to comply with the orders of the President to the punishment that the state may choose to inflict for disobedience. On the contrary, if there be any certainty in language, the 5th section applies exclusively to those of the militia *who [65 are "called forth" by the President, and fail to obey his orders, or, in other words, who refuse to go into the actual service of the United States. It inflicts no penalty in any other case; and it supposes, and justly, that all the cases of disobedience of the militia, while in actual service, were sufficiently provided for by the 4th section of the act, they being thereby subjected to the rules and articles of war. It inflicts the penalty, too, as we have already seen, in the identical cases, and none other, to which the paragraphs of the militia act of Pennsylvania now in question pointedly address themselves; and in the identical case for which the present plaintiff was tried, convicted and punished, by the state court-martial. So that if the defendant's construction of the act of 1795 could prevail, it would not help his case. All the difficulties as to the repugnancy between the act of Congress and of Pennsylvania, would still remain, with the additional difficulty, that the court would be driven to say, that the mere act of calling forth put the militia, ipso facto, into actual service, and so placed them exclusively under the government of Congress.

In the remarks which have already been made, the answer to another proposition stated by the defendant is necessarily included. The offense to which the penalties are annexed in the 4th section of the act of 1795, is not an offense against state authority, but against the United States, created by a law of Congress, in virtue of a constitutional authority, and punishable by a tribunal which it has selected, and which it can change at its pleasure.

66*] *That tribunal is a court-martial; and the defendant contends, that as no explanatory terms are added, a state court-martial is necessarily intended, because the laws of the Union have not effectually created any court-martial, which, sitting under the authority of the United States, can in all cases try the offense. It will at once be seen that the act of 1795 has not expressly delegated cognizance of the offense to a state court-martial, and the question naturally arises, in what manner, then, can it be claimed? When a military offense is created by an act of Congress to be punished by a court-martial, how is such an act to be interpreted? If a similar clause were in a state law, we should be at no loss to give an immediate and definite construction to it, viz., that it pointed to a state court-martial—and why? Because the offense being created by state legislation, to be executed for state purposes, must be supposed to contemplate in its execution such tribunals as the state may erect, and control, and confer jurisdiction upon. A state legislature cannot be presumed to legislate as to foreign tribunals; but must be supposed to speak in reference to those which may be reached by its own sovereignty. Precisely the same reason must apply to the construction of a law of the United States. The object of the law being to provide for the exercise of a power vested in Congress by the constitution, whatever is directed to be done must be supposed to be done, unless the contrary be expressed, under the authority of the Union. When, then, a court-martial is spoken of in general terms in the act of 1795, 67*] the reasonable interpretation *is, that it is a court-martial to be organized under the authority of the United States—a court-martial whom Congress may convene and regulate. There is no pretense to say that Congress can compel a state court martial to convene and sit in judgment on such offense. Such an authority is nowhere confided to it by the constitution. Its power is limited to the few cases already specified, and these most assuredly do not embrace it; for it is not an implied power necessary or proper to carry into effect the given powers. The nation may organize its own tribunals for this purpose; and it has no necessity to resort to other tribunals to enforce its rights. If it do not choose to organize such tribunals, it is its own fault; but it is not, therefore, imperative upon a state tribunal to volunteer in its service. The 6th section of the same act comes in aid of this most reasonable construction. It declares that courts-martial for the trial of militia shall be composed of militia officers only, which plainly shows that it supposed that regular troops and officers were in Wheat. 5.

the same service; and yet, it is as plain that this provision would be superfluous, if state courts-martial were solely intended, since the states do not keep, and ordinarily have no authority to keep, regular troops, but are bound to confine themselves to militia. It might with as much propriety be contended that the courts-martial for the trial of militia under the 97th article of the rules and articles of war, are to be state courts-martial. The language of that article, so far as respects this point, is *almost the [68 same with the clause now under consideration.

As to the argument itself, upon which the defendant erects his construction of this part of the act, its solidity is not admitted. It does not follow, because Congress have neglected to provide adequate means to enforce their laws, that a resulting trust is reposed in the state tribunals to enforce them. If an offense be created of which no court of the United States has a vested cognizance, the state court may not, therefore, assume jurisdiction, and punish it. It cannot be pretended that the states have retained any power to enforce fines and penalties created by the laws of the United States in virtue of their general sovereignty, for that sovereignty did not originally attach on such subjects. They sprung from the Union, and had no previous existence. It would be a strange anomaly in our national jurisprudence to hold the doctrine, that because a new power created by the constitution of the United States was not exercised to its full extent, therefore the states might exercise it by a sort of process in aid. For instance, because Congress decline “to borrow money on the credit of the United States,” or “to constitute tribunals inferior to the Supreme Court,” or “to make rules for the government and regulation of the land and naval forces,” or exercise either of them defectively, that a state might step in, and by its legislation supply those defects, or assume a general jurisdiction on these subjects. If, therefore, it be conceded, that Congress have not as yet legislated to the extent of organizing courts-martial for the trial of offenses created by the act of 1795, it is not conceded that *there- [69 fore state courts-martial may, in virtue of state laws, exercise the authority, and punish offenders. Congress may hereafter supply such defects, and cure all inconveniences.

It is a general principle, too, in the policy, if not the customary law of nations, that no nation is bound to enforce the penal laws of another within its own dominions. The authority naturally belongs, and is confided, to the tribunals of the nation creating the offenses. In a government formed like ours, where there is a division of sovereignty, and, of course, where there is a danger of collision from the near approach of powers to a conflict with each other, it would seem a peculiarly safe and salutary rule, that each government should be left to enforce its own penal laws in its own tribunals. It has been expressly held, by this court, that no part of the criminal jurisdiction of the United States can consistently with the constitution be delegated by Congress to state tribunals;<sup>1</sup> and there is not the slightest inclination to retract that opinion. The judicial power of the Union clearly extends to all such cases. No concurrent power is retained by the states, because the subject-matter derives its existence from the constitution; and the authority of Congress to delegate it cannot be implied, for it is not necessary or proper in any constitutional sense. But even if Congress could delegate it, it would still remain to be shown that it had so done. 70*] We have seen that this cannot be correctly deduced from the act of 1795; and we are, therefore, driven to decide, whether a state can, without such delegation, constitutionally assume and exercise it.

It is not, however, admitted, that the laws of the United States have not enabled courts-martial to be held under their own authority for the trial of these offenses, at least when there are militia officers acting in service in conjunction with regular troops. The 97th article of war gives an authority for the trial of militia in many cases; and the act of the 18th of April, 1814, ch. 141 (which has now expired), provided, as we have already seen, for cases where the militia was acting alone. To what extent these laws applied is not now necessary to be determined. The subject is introduced solely to prevent any conclusion that they are deemed to be wholly inapplicable. Upon the whole, I am of opinion that the courts-martial intended by the act of 1795 are not state courts-martial, but those of the United States; and this is the same construction which has been already put upon the same act by the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania.<sup>1</sup>

What, then, is the state of the case before the court? Congress, by a law, declare that the officers and privates of the militia who shall, when called forth by the President, fail to obey his orders, shall be liable to certain penalties, to be adjudged by a court-martial convened under its own authority. The legislature of Pennsylvania inflict the same penalties 71*] for the same disobedience, and direct these penalties to be adjudged by a state court-martial called exclusively under its own authority. The offense is created by a law of the United States, and is solely against their authority, and made punishable in a specific manner; the legislature of Pennsylvania, without the assent of the United States, insist upon being an auxiliary, nay, as the defendant contends, a principal, if not a paramount, sovereign, in its execution. This is the real state of the case; and it is said, without the slightest disrespect for the legislature of Pennsylvania, who, in passing this act, were, without question, governed by the highest motives of patriotism, public honor, and fidelity to the Union. If it has transcended its legitimate authority, it has committed an unintentional error, which it will be the first to repair, and the last to vindicate. Our duty compels us, however, to compare the legislation, and not the intention, with the standard of the constitution.

It has not been denied that Congress may constitutionally delegate to its own courts exclusive jurisdiction over cases arising under its own laws. It is, too, a general principle in the construction of statutes, that where a penalty is prescribed to be recovered in a special manner, in a special court, it excludes a recovery in any other mode or court. The language is deemed expressive of the sense of the legislature, that the jurisdiction shall be exclusive. In such a case, it is a violation of the statute for any other tribunal to assume jurisdiction. If, then, we strip the case before the court of all unnecessary appendages, it presents [*72] this point, that Congress had declared that its own courts-martial shall have exclusive jurisdiction of the offense; and the state of Pennsylvania claims a right to interfere with that exclusive jurisdiction, and to decide in its own courts upon the merits of every case of alleged delinquency. Can a more direct collision with the authority of the United States be imagined? It is an exercise of concurrent authority where the laws of Congress have constitutionally denied it. If an act of Congress be the supreme law of the land, it cannot be made more binding by an affirmative re-enactment of the same act by a state legislature. The latter must be merely inoperative and void, for it seeks to give sanction to that which already possesses the highest sanction.

What are the consequences, if the state legislation in the present case be constitutional? In the first place, if the trial in the state court-martial be on the merits, and end in a condemnation or acquittal, one of two things must follow, either that the United States court-martial are thereby divested of their authority to try the same case, in violation of the jurisdiction confided to them by Congress; or that the delinquents are liable to be twice tried and punished for the same offense, against the manifest intent of the act of Congress, the principles of the common law, and the genius of our free government. In the next place, it is not perceived how the right of the President to pardon the offense can be effectually exerted; for if the state legislature can, as the defendant contends, by its own enactment, make it a state offense, the pardoning power of the state *can alone purge away such an offense. [*73] The President has no authority to interfere in such a case. In the next place, if the state can re-enact the same penalties, it may enact penalties substantially different for the same offense, to be adjudged in its own courts. If it possess a concurrent power of legislation, so as to make it a distinct state offense, what punishments it shall impose must depend upon its own discretion. In the exercise of that discretion, it is not liable to the control of the United States. It may enact more severe or more mild punishments than those declared by Congress. And thus an offense originally created by the laws of the United States, and growing out of their authority, may be visited with penalties utterly incompatible with the intent of the national legislature. It may be said that state legislation cannot be thus exercised, because its concurrent power must be in subordination to that of the United States. If this be true (and it is believed to be so), then it must be upon the ground that the offense cannot be made a distinct state offense, but is exclusively created by the laws of the United States, and is to be tried and punished as Congress has directed, and not in any other manner or to any other extent. Yet the argument of the defendant's counsel might be here urged, that the state law was merely auxiliary to that of the United States; and that it sought only to enforce a public duty more effectually by other penalties, in aid of those prescribed by Congress. The repugnancy of such a state law to the national authority would, nevertheless, be manifest, 74*] since it would seek *to punish an offense created by Congress, differently from the declared will of Congress. And the repugnancy is not, in my judgment, less manifest where the state law undertakes to punish an offense by a state court-martial, which the law of the United States confines to the jurisdiction of a national court-martial.

The present case has been illustrated in the argument of the defendant's counsel, by a reference to cases in which state courts under state laws exercise a concurrent jurisdiction over offenses created and punished by the laws of the United States. The only case of this description which has been cited at the bar, is the forgery of notes of the Bank of the United States, which by an act of Congress was punished by fine and imprisonment, and which under state laws has also been punished in some state courts, and particularly in Pennsylvania.<sup>1</sup> In respect to this case, it is to be recollected that there is an express proviso in the act of Congress, that nothing in that act should be construed to deprive the state courts of their jurisdiction under the state laws over the offenses declared punishable by that act. There is no such proviso in the act of 1795, and, therefore, there is no complete analogy to support the illustration.

That there are cases in which an offense particularly aimed against the laws or authority of the United States may, at the same time, be directed against state authority also, and thus 75*] be within the *legitimate reach of state legislation, in the absence of national legislation on the same subject, I pretend not to affirm, or to deny. It will be sufficient to meet such a case when it shall arise. But that an offense against the constitutional authority of the United States can, after the national legislature has provided for its trial and punishment, be cognizable in a state court, in virtue of a state law creating a like offense, and defining its punishment, without the consent of Congress, I am very far from being ready to admit. It seems to me that such an exercise of state authority is completely open to the great objections which are presented in the case before us. Take the case of a capital offense, as, for instance, treason against the United States: can a state legislature vest its own courts with jurisdiction over such an offense, and punish it either capitally or otherwise? Can the national courts be ousted of their jurisdiction by a trial of the offender in a state court? Would an acquittal in a state court be a good bar upon an indictment for the offense in the national courts? Can the offender, against the letter of the constitution of the United States, "be subject for the same offense, to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb?" These are questions which, it seems to me, are exceedingly difficult to answer in the affirmative. The case, then, put by the defendant's counsel, clears away none of the embarrassments which surround their construction of the case at the bar of the court.

1.—See White v. Commonwealth, 4 Binn. Rep. 418; Livingston v. Van Ingen, 9 Johns. Rep. 507, 567. Wheat. 5.

Upon the whole, with whatever reluctance, I feel myself bound to declare that the clauses of the militia *act of Pennsylvania now [*76 in question, are repugnant to the constitutional laws of Congress on the same subject and are utterly void; and that, therefore, the judgment of the state court ought to be reversed. In this opinion I have the concurrence of one of my brethren.

[CONSTITUTIONAL LAW.]

THE UNITED STATES v. WILTBERGER.

The courts of the United States have no jurisdiction, under the act of April 30th, 1790, c. 36, of the crime of manslaughter, committed by the master upon one of the seamen on board a merchant vessel of the United States, lying in the River Tigris, in the empire of China, 35 miles above its mouth, off Wampoa, about 100 yards from the shore, in four and a half fathoms water, and below low water-mark.

Though penal laws are to be construed strictly, yet the intention of the legislature must govern in the construction of penal, as well as other statutes, and they are not to be construed so strictly as to defeat the obvious intention of the legislature.

In the act of April 30th, 1790, c. 36, the description of places contained in the 8th section, within which the offenses therein enumerated must be committed, in order to give the courts of the Union jurisdiction over them, cannot be transferred to the 12th section, so as to give those courts jurisdiction over a manslaughter committed in the river of a foreign country, and not on the high seas.

THIS was an indictment for manslaughter, in the Circuit Court of Pennsylvania. The jury found the defendant guilty of the offense with which he *stood indicted, subject [*77 to the opinion of the court, whether this court has jurisdiction of the case, which was as follows:

The manslaughter charged in the indictment was committed by the defendant on board of the American ship the Benjamin Rush, on a seaman belonging to the said ship, whereof the defendant was master, in the River Tigris, in the empire of China, off Wampoa, and about 100 yards from the shore, in four and a half fathoms water, and below the low water-mark, thirty-five miles above the mouth of the river. The water at the said place where the offense was committed is fresh, except in very dry seasons, and the tide ebbs and flows at, and

Under the United States statute of 30th April, 1790, c. 9, s. 8, the "high seas" mean any waters on the sea-coast which are without the boundaries of low water-mark. *U. S. v. above the said place. At the mouth of the Tigris, the government of China has forts on each side of the river, where custom-house officers are taken in by foreign vessels to prevent smuggling. The river at the mouth, and at Wampoa, is about half a mile in breadth.

And thereupon, the opinions of the judges of the Circuit Court, being opposed as to the jurisdiction of the court, the question was by them stated, and directed to be certified to this court.

Mr. C. J. Ingersoll, for the United States, argued, that by the constitution the judicial power extends to all cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, and Congress is invested with authority to define and punish piracies and other felonies committed on the high seas. The judiciary act of 1789, c. 20, s. 11, gives jurisdiction over these offenses to the Circuit Court. 78* The act of April 30th, 1790, c. 36, for *the punishment of certain crimes against the United States, s. 12, provides for the punishment of manslaughter committed on the high seas.<sup>1</sup>

1.—The sections of this act commented on in the argument, are as follows:

SEC. I. That if any person or persons, owing allegiance to the United States of America, shall levy war against them, or shall adhere to their enemies, giving them aid and comfort within the United States, or elsewhere, and shall be thereof convicted, on confession in open court, or on the testimony of two witnesses to the same overt act of treason whereof he or they shall stand indicted, such person or persons shall be adjudged guilty of treason against the United States, and shall suffer death.

SEC. II. And be it enacted, That if any person or persons, having knowledge of the commission of any of the treasons aforesaid, shall conceal, and not, as soon as may be, disclose and make known the same to the President of the United States, or some of the judges thereof, or to the President or Governor of a particular state, or some one of the judges or justices thereof, such person or persons, on conviction, shall be adjudged guilty of misprision of treason, and shall be imprisoned not exceeding seven years, and fined not exceeding one thousand dollars.

SEC. III. And be it enacted, That if any person or persons shall, within any fort, arsenal, dock-yard, magazine, or in any other place or district of country, under the sole and exclusive jurisdiction of the United States, commit the crime of willful murder, such person or persons, on being thereof convicted, shall suffer death.

SEC. VI. And be it enacted, That if any person or persons, having knowledge of the actual commission of the crime of willful murder, or other felony, upon the high seas, or within any fort, arsenal, dock-yard, magazine, or other place or district of country, under the sole and exclusive jurisdiction of the United States, shall conceal, and not, as soon as may be, disclose and make known the same to some one of the judges, or other persons in civil or military authority under the United States, on conviction thereof, such person or persons shall be adjudged guilty of misprision of felony, and shall be imprisoned not exceeding three years, and fined not exceeding five hundred dollars.

SEC. VII. And be it enacted, That if any person or persons shall, within any fort, arsenal, dock-yard, magazine, or other place or district of country, under the sole and exclusive jurisdiction of the United States, commit the crime of manslaughter, and shall be thereof convicted, such person or persons shall be imprisoned not exceeding three years, and fined not exceeding one thousand dollars.

SEC. VIII. And be it enacted, That if any person or persons shall commit, upon the high seas, or in any river, haven, basin or bay, out of the jurisdiction of any particular state, murder or robbery, or any other offense, which, if committed within the body of a county, would, by the laws of the United States, be punishable with death; or, if any captain or mariner of any ship or other vessel, shall piratically and feloniously run away with such ship or vessel, or any goods or merchandise, to the value of fifty dollars, or yield up such ship or vessel voluntarily to any pirate; or if any seaman shall lay violent hands upon his commander, thereby to

The state courts have jurisdiction of offenses committed on the arms of the sea, creeks, havens, basins and bays, within the ebb and flow of the tide, when those places are within the body of a county, in such cases the circuit courts of the United States have no jurisdiction under the act of 1825. *U. 2. That the local jurisdiction of the Chinese empire over the offense charged by the indictment, if found by the jury to have been committed within its territorial limits, necessarily excludes the jurisdiction of the courts of this 82*] country over the offense. *To this objection, it is answered, that by the principles of universal law, a qualified national jurisdiction and immunity extends to the ships of the nation, public and private, wherever they may be. As to public vessels, this immunity is unquestionable.<sup>1</sup> And even private vessels, though from the necessity of the case, subject to the revenue laws of the country where they may be, are yet in many respects exempted from the local jurisdiction. Minor crimes, which do not offend the safety or dignity of the local sovereignty, are usually left to the cognizance of the government to whose subjects the vessel belongs. Nor does this, in the slightest degree, affect the eminent domain and sovereignty of the foreign nation over its harbors and rivers.<sup>2</sup> But China herself disclaims jurisdiction in such cases, and renvoys them to the forum of the offending party.<sup>3</sup> The offense here, being *committed by a citizen of the United [*83

SEC. IX. And be it enacted, That if any citizen shall commit any piracy or robbery, aforesaid, or any act of hostility against the United States, or any citizen thereof, upon the high seas, under color of any commission from any foreign prince or state, or on pretense of authority from any person, such offender shall, notwithstanding the pretense of authority, be deemed, adjudged, and taken to be, a pirate, felon, and robber, and on being thereof convicted, shall suffer death.

SEC. X. And be it enacted, That every person who shall, either upon the land or seas, knowingly and wittingly aid and assist, procure, command, counsel or advise, any person or persons to do or commit any murder or robbery, or other piracy aforesaid, upon the high seas, which shall affect the life of such person, and such person or persons shall thereupon do or commit any such piracy or robbery, then all and every such person, so aforesaid, aiding, assisting, procuring, commanding, counseling, or advising the same, either upon the land or the sea, shall be and they are hereby declared, deemed, and adjudged to be, accessory to such piracies before the fact, and every such person, being thereof convicted, shall suffer death.

SEC. XI. And be it enacted, That after any murder, felony, robbery, or other piracy whatsoever, aforesaid, is or shall be committed by any pirate or robber, every person who, knowing that such pirate or robber has done or committed any such piracy or robbery, shall, on the land or at sea, receive, entertain, or conceal, any such pirate or robber, or receive or take into his custody any ship, vessel, goods, or chattels, which have been, by any such pirate or robber, piratically and feloniously taken, shall be, and are hereby declared, deemed and adjudged, to be accessory to such piracy or robbery, after the fact; and on conviction thereof, shall be imprisoned, not exceeding three years, and fined, not exceeding five hundred dollars.

SEC. XII. 3.—Sir George Staunton's Translation of the Laws of China, 36, 523. The following extracts from this work were read at the argument, and it is thought their insertion here will not be unacceptable to the learned reader:

"Offenses committed by foreigners. (*) In general all foreigners who come to submit themselves to the government of the empire, shall, when guilty of offenses, be tried and sentenced according to the established laws. The particular decisions, however, of the tribunal Lee-Fan-Yuen. (+) shall be guided according to regulations framed for the government of the Mongol tribes.

Note (*)—"This section of the code has been expressly quoted by the provincial government of Canton, and applied to the case of foreigners residing there and at Macao for the purposes of trade. The laws of China have never, however, been attempted to be enforced against those foreigners, except with considerable allowances in their favor, although, on the other hand, they are restricted and circumscribed in such a manner that a transgression on their part of any specific article of the laws can scarcely occur; at least, not without at the same time implicating and involving in their guilt some of the natives, who thus in most cases become the principal victims of offended justice. The situation of Europeans in China is certainly by no means so satisfactory on the whole as might be desired, or even as it may be reasonably expected to become in the progress of time, unless some untoward circumstance should occur to check the gradual course of improvement. It must be admitted, however, that the extreme contrariety of manners, habits, and language, renders some such arrangement, as that now subsisting for the regulation of the intercourse between the Europeans and the natives, absolutely indispensable, as well as conducive to the interests of both parties.

Note (+)—This tribunal might be styled the office or department for foreign affairs, but its chief concern is with the tributary and the subject states of Tartary." P. 36.

"The foregoing being the substance of the report of the viceroy to his imperial majesty, we have deliberated thereon, and have ascertained that, according to the preliminary book of the penal code, all persons from foreign parts committing offenses, shall undergo trial, and receive sentence according to the laws of the empire. Moreover, we find it declared in the same code, that any person accidentally killing another, shall be allowed to redeem himself from punishment, by the payment of a fine; lastly, we find, that on the eighth year of Kien-Lung (1743), it was ordered, in reply to the address of the viceroy of Canton, then in office, that thenceforward, in all cases of offenses by contrivance, design, or in affrays happening between foreigners and natives, whereby such foreigners are liable, according to law, to suffer death by being strangled or beheaded, the magistrate of the district shall receive the proofs and evidence thereof, at the period of the preliminary investigation, and after having fully and distinctly inquired into the reality of the circumstances, report the result to the viceroy and sub-viceroy, who are thereupon strictly to repeat and revise the investigation. If the determination of the inferior courts, upon the alleged facts, and upon the application of the laws, is found to have been just and accurate, the States upon another citizen, on board a merchant vessel of this country, lying in the waters of a foreign country, which expressly disclaims jurisdiction of the case, it is punishable, unless it be punishable in the courts of this country; and it appears at least questionable whether there is any constitutional power in Congress to punish it, except in the mode already provided for, as an offense committed on the high seas. This brings us to the 3d objection, which is, that the offense was not committed "on the high seas," within the true intent and meaning of the act of April, 1790, c. 36, s. 12. In answer to this objection, it is insisted, that before the adoption of the present constitution, the admiralty and maritime jurisdiction extended everywhere on tide waters below low water-mark.<sup>1</sup> The same extension has been given to the admiralty jurisdiction under the constitution.<sup>2</sup> The opposite argument is founded on the expression "high seas," as contradistinguished from that portion of the sea where the tide ebbs and flows, but which is inclosed by head lands, or forms parts of rivers above their mouths. But the celebrated statutes of Richard II., regulating the admiralty jurisdiction, allow the admiral to have cognizance of things done on the sea, "sur le meer," without the addition of high. The stat. 27 Eliz. uses the expression "main sea." The 28 Hen. VIII., c. 15, concerning the trial of crimes committed within the admiralty jurisdiction, uses the terms, "in and upon the sea, or in any other haven, creek, river, or place, where the admiral hath, or pretends to have, power, authority, or jurisdiction."<sup>3</sup> The act of Congress of 1790, c. 9, uses the terms promiscuously, "high seas" (s. 8, s. 9), "the seas" (s. 10), "the sea" (s. 11), "high seas and seas" (s. 12). The term "sea" is water, as contradistinguished from land. The term "high sea" does not necessarily import deep sea; although the classical writers frequently use the correspondent Latin word in that figurative sense; as altum æquor, altissimum flumen, &c. It is a common expletive applied, in both languages, to "sea," "road," "crime," and many other things. The contrary acceptation of the term "high sea," would exclude bays, arms of the sea, coves, belts, straits, estuaries, great rivers, and lakes. There is no other limit to the sea, but that where the tide ceases to ebb and flow, whether on the sea-coast or in bays and rivers. Even the English statutes of Richard II., made to restrict the admiralty jurisdiction, and in derogation of its ancient authority, give it cognizance of murders, &c., committed on board great ships in the streams of great rivers below the first bridges. So the French law gives the admiralty the same jurisdiction, as to rivers, for which we contend.<sup>4</sup> The case of the United States v. Bevens<sup>5</sup> does not stand in our way, for the point now in question was not determined in that case.

Mr. Sergeant, contra, stated, that the indictment in this case, pursuing the words of the act, charges the offense to have been committed upon the "high seas." It is of no consequence what may be the extent of the power given by the constitution to the government of the Union. The question is, to what extent has the power so given been exercised? It is not necessary, therefore, to enquire whether this was an offense within the admiralty jurisdiction. The only question is, whether it is within the true meaning of the act of Congress.<sup>6</sup> The offense in question, if committed at all, was not committed upon the high seas; whether these terms be considered in their ordinary sense, as used in foreign authorities of the law; as employed in acts of Congress; as used in the act in question; or as expounded by our own judicial decisions. 1. The national character of the ship or vessel in which the offense was committed makes no difference in this case. A public armed vessel is a part of the national sovereign force, clothed with the sovereign character, and, wherever she goes, entitled to immunity. She is subject only to the jurisdiction of her sovereign, and is a part of his territory;<sup>7</sup> is exempt from visitation and search, and governed by such laws as her sovereign may choose to give her. The immunity she enjoys does not depend upon the civil or admiralty law; but, like the privilege of an ambassador, or the immunity of troops on their passage, depends upon the law of nations. Every sovereign may refuse admission, but having admitted, is bound to respect. Still, it does not follow that the courts of her own country have jurisdiction on board of her. Be this as it may, a private ship has no such immunity. On the ocean she is bound to submit to visitation and search. In port she is bound to submit to the local jurisdiction, and entitled to the benefit of the laws of the place. Those who are on board of her incur the obligation of a temporary allegiance, and are, in all respects, amenable to the laws of the country in which they are found; to its penal laws especially. The ocean, the high seas, are a common domain; and every ship, private as well as public, is there upon the territory of her sovereign, and amenable to no laws but the laws of her sovereign and the law of nations. It is from this principle that every nation derives its jurisdiction over the persons on board its ships; the spot they occupy in the common domain is its own territory, and it has a right to give the law to it.<sup>8</sup> 2. The na-magistrate of the district shall, lastly, receive orders to proceed, in conjunction with the chief of the nation, to take the offender to execution, according to his sentence.

In all other instances of offenses committed under what the laws declare to be palliating circumstances, and which are, therefore, not capitally punishable, the offender shall be sent away to be punished in his own country. February, 1808." P. 523.

tional character of the offender, or of the person offended, makes no difference; if the crew had all shipped in England, and been English subjects, they would have been equally entitled to protection, and equally amenable to our laws. If, upon the ocean, or high seas, a foreigner had been murdered, his death would have been equally avenged by our laws. If a foreigner on board this ship had committed an offense, he would equally have been liable. It is not correct, then, to say that personal jurisdiction is universal as to citizens; nor that it does in no case extend to foreigners. 3. In the next place, the extent or true nature of the constitutional power is wholly immaterial in this case. That instrument had in view, 1st. To partition powers between the Union and the states. 2d. To distribute powers among the different branches of the national government. The judicial power, in its exercise, is subordinate and auxiliary to the power of Congress. 89*] The whole *jurisdiction has never been exercised. But the principle, in its application to the very case, has been decided in the case of The United States v. Bevan.<sup>1</sup> It follows, therefore, that the judicial authority is of no avail, unless there be a corresponding power in Congress; that as the judicial authority is unavailing without a legislative act, it is to the act of Congress alone we must look for the extent of the jurisdiction. When, therefore, the authority of the judiciary is declared to extend to all cases of "admiralty and maritime jurisdiction," it is to be extended only to such cases as Congress have power to provide for. The same power might be exercised through the medium of the state courts, or omitted altogether. It follows, also, most indubitably, that the powers exercised by Congress can receive no illustration from the powers given to the judiciary by the constitution; and we are thus happily relieved from the necessity of exploring the distant speculation of the ancient jurisdiction of the admiralty. 4. What, then, is the true meaning of the terms, on the "high seas," as used in the act of Congress? In their ordinary sense, they mean the open ocean, as distinguished from creeks, rivers, ports, and other bodies of water, inclosed and infraterritorial. The flow of the tide cannot be the true test; for then the sea would flow to the falls of Schuylkill and Delaware, and would comprehend a vessel moored at the wharf. If we refer to the authorities *of the English law, they are clear and uniform. The common lawyers never at any period denied the admiralty jurisdiction upon the "high seas." The civilians claimed a jurisdiction beyond what was conceded to them by the common lawyers, beyond the "high seas;" in rivers, bays, &c. Thus, the very contest, in its origin, admitted that the "high seas" were distinguishable from other waters. The statute 13 Richard II. confined the admiralty to things done upon the "sea."<sup>2</sup> The 15 Richard II. gave it criminal jurisdiction in homicide and mayhem on great rivers, &c.<sup>3</sup> The 27 Eliz. c. 11, is conclusive of the question.<sup>4</sup> Sir Leoline Jenkies makes the distinction expressly.<sup>5</sup> So, also, we have the authority of Lord Hale in many places;<sup>6</sup> and all the authorities agree that the divisum imperium is only upon the sea-coast. The distinction is also perfectly understood and maintained in our own legislation; and the act now in question furnishes the clearest recognition of it, as will appear by a comparison of the 8th with the 12th section. In the 8th section, the distinction is made between the "high seas" and "a river, haven, basin, or bay." The latter expressions can never, by any fair rule of construction applied to penal statutes, be transferred from the 8th to the 12th section. In criminal cases, a strict construction is always to be preferred; and if there be *doubt, that is of itself [*91 conclusive. In Bevan's case, the distinction between the high seas and other inclosed parts of the sea was not denied by the counsel for the United States, and the court do not even mention it as at all doubtful.<sup>7</sup> But it is asked, whether the criminal jurisdiction of the admiralty is not as extensive as the civil? To which it is answered, that the criminal jurisdiction depends upon the place where the offense is committed; the civil, upon the nature of the subject; and there can, therefore, be no comparison of their extent.

The Attorney-General, in reply, insisted, that although penal laws are to be construed strictly, the intention of the Legislature must govern in their construction. If a case be within the intention and reason, it must be considered as within the letter of the statute. This act having been passed by Congress on the first organization of the government, it must have been their intention to make the exercise of their power co-extensive with their jurisdiction; and to punish all the crimes enumerated, in every place within their jurisdiction. The act must, therefore, be construed so as to engraft the words of the 8th section, descriptive of the place in which murder may be committed, on the 12th section, which describes the place in which manslaughter may be committed. After expressing themselves fully in the previous section as to the places in which one of the crimes intended to be punished by the act must be committed, it was natural that the Legislature *should suppose the language en- [*92 grafted into a subsequent section on a subject of the same class. Thus, the 1st section of the act defines the crime of treason, and provides, "that if any person or persons owing allegiance to the United States of America, shall levy war," &c., "such person or persons shall be adjudged guilty of treason," &c. The second section defines misprision of treason, and in specifying the persons who may commit the crime, omits the words "owing allegiance to the United States," and uses without limitation or restriction the general terms "any person or persons." Yet these general terms were obviously intended to be restrained by the words "owing allegiance to the United States," which are used in the preceding section. The crimes of murder and manslaughter are kindred offenses, and are parts of the same general offense of homicide. Congress must have intended to make the same provision for their punishment, as to the places within which they must be committed in order to give jurisdiction to the courts of the Union. Thus, the 3d section of the act describes the places on land in which murder must be committed in order to give those courts jurisdiction of the offense; and the 7th section describes in the very same terms the places on land in which manslaughter must be committed in order to give them jurisdiction. Observe the consequences of a contrary construction as to murder alone. The 9th section extends the guilt of the offenses enumerated in it to a citizen of the United States committing them under color of a foreign commission. But this section, in describing 93* the place where the offense may be committed, omits the words "in any river, haven, basin, or bay," and uses the words "high seas" only. It is incredible that it was the legislative intention to distinguish between the same crime, committed under the pretext of authority by a foreign commission, on the high seas, and on the waters of a foreign state, or of the United States. So, also, the 10th section provides, "that every person who shall, either upon the land or the seas, knowingly and wittingly aid and assist, procure, command, counsel, or advise, any person or persons to do or commit any murder or robbery, or other piracy, aforesaid, upon the seas, which shall affect the life of such person, shall," &c. Here Congress cannot have intended to exempt from punishment those persons who shall be accessories before the fact to a murder or robbery committed "in a river, haven, basin, or bay," &c. A similar argument is applicable to the 11th section. As to the 12th section, beside the offense of manslaughter, the other offenses which it enumerates are all accessory to those mentioned in the 8th. It is, therefore, evidently connected with the 8th.

Mr. Chief Justice MARSHALL delivered the opinion of the court: The indictment in this case is founded on the 12th section of the act, entitled, "an act for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States." That section is in these words: "And be it enacted, that if any seaman, or other person, shall commit manslaughter on the high seas, or confederate," &c., "such person or persons so offending, 94* and being thereof convicted, shall be imprisoned not exceeding three years, and fined not exceeding one thousand dollars."

The jurisdiction of the court depends on the place in which the fact was committed. Manslaughter is not punishable in the courts of the United States, according to the words which have been cited, unless it be committed on the high seas. Is the place described in the special verdict a part of the high seas?

If the words be taken according to the common understanding of mankind—if they be taken in their popular and received sense—the "high seas," if not in all instances confined to the ocean which washes a coast, can never extend to a river about half a mile wide, and in the interior of a country. This extended construction of the words, it has been insisted, is still farther opposed by a comparison of the 12th with the 8th section of the act. In the 8th section, Congress has shown its attention to the distinction between the "high seas" and "a river, haven, basin, or bay." The well-known rule that this is a penal statute, and is to be construed strictly, is also urged upon us.

On the part of the United States, the jurisdiction of the court is sustained, not so much on the extension of the words "high seas," as on that construction of the whole act which would engraft the words of the 8th section, descriptive of the place in which murder may be committed, on the 12th section, which describes the place in which manslaughter may be committed. This transfer of the words of one section to the other is, it has been contended, in pursuance of the obvious intent of the legislature; and in support of the authority of the court so to do, certain maxims, or rules for the construction of statutes have been quoted and relied on. It has been said, that although penal laws are to be construed strictly, the intention of the legislature must govern in their construction. That if a case be within the intention, it must be considered as if within the letter of the statute. So if it be within the reason of the statute.

The rule that penal laws are to be construed strictly, is perhaps not much less old than construction itself. It is founded on the tenderness of the law for the rights of individuals; and on the plain principle that the power of punishment is vested in the legislative, not in the judicial department. It is the legislature, not the court, which is to define a crime, and ordain its punishment.

It is said, that notwithstanding this rule, the intention of the law-maker must govern in the construction of penal, as well as other statutes. This is true. But this is not a new independent rule which subverts the old. It is a modification of the ancient maxim, and amounts to this, that though penal laws are to be construed strictly, they are not to be construed so strictly as to defeat the obvious intention of the legislature. The maxim is not to be so applied as to narrow the words of the statute to the exclusion of cases which those words, in their ordinary acceptation, or in that sense in which the legislature has obviously used them, would comprehend. The intention of the legislature is to be collected from the words they employ. Where there is no ambiguity in the 96 words, there is no room for construction. The case must be a strong one indeed, which would justify a court in departing from the plain meaning of words, especially in a penal act, in search of an intention which the words themselves did not suggest. To determine that a case is within the intention of a statute, its language must authorize us to say so. It would be dangerous, indeed, to carry the principle, that a case which is within the reason or mischief of a statute, is within its provisions, so far as to punish a crime not enumerated in the statute, because it is of equal atrocity, or of kindred character, with those which are enumerated. If this principle has ever been recognized in expounding criminal law, it has been in cases of considerable irritation, which it would be unsafe to consider as precedents forming a general rule for other cases.

Having premised these general observations, the court will proceed to the examination of the act, in order to determine whether the intention to incorporate the description of place contained in the 8th section, into the 12th, be so apparent as to justify the court in so doing. It is contended, that throughout the act the description of one section is full, and is necessarily to be carried into all the other sections which relate to place, or to crime.

The 1st section defines the crime of treason, and declares, "that if any person or persons owing allegiance to the United States of America shall levy war," &c., "such person or persons shall be adjudged guilty of treason," &c. The second section defines misprision of 97 treason; and in the description of the *persons who may commit it, omits the words "owing allegiance to the United States," and uses without limitation, the general terms "any person or persons." Yet, it has been said, these general terms were obviously intended to be limited, and must be limited, by the words "owing allegiance to the United States," which are used in the preceding section.

It is admitted that the general terms of the 2d section must be so limited; but it is not admitted that the inference drawn from this circumstance, in favor of incorporating the words of one section of this act into another, is a fair one. Treason is a breach of allegiance, and can be committed by him only who owes allegiance either perpetual or temporary. The words, therefore, "owing allegiance to the United States," in the first section, are entirely surplus words, which do not, in the slightest degree affect its sense. The construction would be precisely the same were they omitted. When, therefore, we give the same construction to the second section, we do not carry those words into it, but construe it as it would be construed independent of the first. There is, too, in a penal statute, a difference between restraining general words and enlarging particular words.

The crimes of murder and of manslaughter, it has been truly said, are kindred crimes; and there is much reason for supposing that the legislature intended to make the same provision for the jurisdiction of its courts, as to the place in which either might be committed. In illustration of this position, the 3d and 7th sections 98 of the act have been cited. *The 3d section describes the places in which murder on land may be committed, of which the courts of the United States may take cognizance; and the 7th section describes, in precisely the same terms, the places on land, if manslaughter be committed, in which the offender may be prosecuted in the federal courts.

It is true, that so far as respects place, the words of the 3d section concerning murder are repeated in the 7th, and applied to manslaughter; but this circumstance suggests a very different inference from that which has been drawn from it. When the legislature is about to describe the places in which manslaughter, cognizable in the courts of the United States, may be committed, no reference whatsoever is made to a prior section respecting murder; but the description is as full and ample as if the prior section had not been in the act. This would rather justify the opinion, that in proceeding to manslaughter, the legislature did not mean to refer us to the section on murder for a description of the place in which the crime might be committed, but did mean to give us a full description in the section on that subject.

So, the 6th section, which punishes those who have knowledge of the commission of murder, or other felony, describes the places on land in which the murder is to be committed, to constitute the crime, with the same minuteness which had been before employed in the 3d, and was, afterwards, employed in the 7th section.

In the 8th section, the legislature takes up the subject *of murder, and other felonies, committed on the water, and is full in the description of place. "If any person or persons shall commit upon the high seas, or in any river, haven, basin or bay, out of the jurisdiction of any particular state, murder," &c.

The 9th section of the act applies to a citizen who shall commit any of the offenses described in the 8th section, against the United States, or a citizen thereof, under color of a commission from any foreign prince or state.

It is observable, that this section, in its description of place, omits the words, "in any river, haven, basin, or bay," and uses the words "high seas" only. It has been argued, and, we admit, with great force, that in this section the legislature intended to take from a citizen offending against the United States, under color of a commission from a foreign power, any pretense to protection from that commission; and it is almost impossible to believe that there could have been a deliberate intention to distinguish between the same offense, committed under color of such commission, on the high seas, and on the waters of a foreign state, or of the United States, out of the jurisdiction of any particular state. This would unquestionably have been the operation of the section, had the words, "on the high seas," been omitted. Yet it would be carrying construction very far to strike out those words. Their whole effect is to limit the operation which the sentence would have without them; and it is making very free with legislative language, to declare them totally useless, when they are sensible, and are calculated to have a decided *influence [*100] on the meaning of the clause. That case is not directly before us, and we may perhaps be relieved from ever deciding it. For the present purpose, it will be sufficient to say, that the determination of that question in the affirmative would not, we think, be conclusive with respect to that now under consideration. The 9th section refers expressly, so far at least as respects piracy or robbery, to the 8th; and its whole language shows that its sole object is to render a citizen who offends against the United States or their citizens, under color of a foreign commission, punishable in the same degree as if no such commission existed. The clearness with which this intent is manifested by the language of the whole section, might perhaps justify a latitude of construction which would not be allowable where the intent is less clearly manifested; where we are to be guided, not so much by the words in which the provision is made as by our opinion of the reasonableness of making it.

But here, too, it cannot escape notice, that the legislature has not referred for a description of the place to the preceding section, but has inserted a description, and by that insertion has created the whole difficulty of the case.

The 10th section declares the punishment of accessories before the fact. It enacts, "that every person who shall, either upon the land or the seas, knowingly and wittingly, aid and assist, procure, command, counsel, or advise any person or persons to do or commit any murder 101* or robbery, or other piracy, *aforesaid, upon the seas, which shall affect the life of such persons, shall," &c.

Upon this section, also, as on the preceding, it has been argued, that the legislature cannot have intended to exclude from punishment those who shall be accessories before the fact to a murder or robbery committed "in a river, haven, basin, or bay, out of the jurisdiction of any state;" and now, as then, the argument has great weight. But it is again to be observed, that the legislature has not referred for a description of place to any previous parts of the law, but has inserted a description, and by so doing, has materially varied the obvious sense of the section. "Every person who shall, either upon the land or the seas, knowingly and wittingly aid," &c. The probability is, that the legislature designed to punish all persons amenable to their laws, who should, in any place, aid and assist, procure, command, counsel, or advise, any person or persons to commit any murder or piracy punishable under the act. And such would have been the operation of the sentence, had the words, "upon the land or the seas" been omitted. But the legislature has chosen to describe the place where the accessorial offense is to be committed, and has not referred to a description contained in any other part of the act. The words are, "upon the land or the seas." The court cannot reject this description. If we might supply the words "river, haven," &c., because they are stated in the 8th section, must we supply "fort, arsenal," &c., which are used in the 3d section, describing the place in which murder may be committed on land? In doing so, we should 102* probably defeat the will of the legislature. Yet if we depart from the description of place given in the section, in which Congress has obviously intended to describe it, for the purpose of annexing to the word "seas" the words "river, haven, basin, or bay," found in the 8th section, there would be at least some appearance of reason in the argument, which would require us to annex also to the word "land" the words "fort, arsenal," &c., found in the 3d section.

After describing the place in which the "aid, assistance, procurement, command, counsel, or advice" must be given, in order to give to the courts of the United States jurisdiction over the offense, the legislature proceeds to describe the crime so to be commanded or procured, and the place in which such crime must be committed. The crime is, "any murder or robbery, or other piracy, aforesaid." The place is "upon the seas."

In this section, as in the preceding, had the words "upon the seas" been omitted, the construction would have been that which, according to the argument on the part of the United States, it ought now to be. But these words are sensible and are material. They constitute the description of place which the legislature has chosen to give us; and courts cannot safely vary that description without some sure guide to direct their way.

The observations made on this section apply so precisely to the 11th that they need not be repeated.

The legal construction of those sections is doubtful, and the court is not now, and may perhaps never *be, required to make it. [*103 It is sufficient to say, that should it even be such as the Attorney-General contends it ought to be, the reasons in favor of that construction do not apply conclusively to the 12th section. They both contain a direct reference to the 8th section. They describe accessorial offenses, which from their nature are more intimately connected with the principal offense than distinct crimes are with each other.

The 12th section takes up the crime of manslaughter, which is not mentioned in the 8th, and, without any reference to the 8th, describes the place in which it must be committed, in order to give jurisdiction to the courts of the United States. That place is "on the high seas." There is nothing in this section which can authorize the court to take jurisdiction of manslaughter committed elsewhere.

To prove the connection between this section and the 8th, the attention of the court has been directed to the other offenses it recapitulates, which are said to be accessorial to those enumerated in the 8th. They are admitted to be accessorial; but the court draws a different inference from this circumstance. Manslaughter is an independent crime, distinct from murder, and the legislature annexes to the offense a description of the place in which it must be committed in order to give the court jurisdiction. The same section then proceeds to enumerate certain other crimes which are accessorial in their nature, without any description of places. To manslaughter, the principal crime, the right to punish which depends on the place in which it is committed, Congress has annexed a description of place. To the other crimes enumerated *in the same [*104 section, which are accessorial in their nature, and some of which at least may be committed anywhere, Congress has annexed no description of place. The conclusion seems irresistible, that Congress has not in this section inserted the limitation of place inadvertently; and the distinction which the legislature has taken must, of course, be respected by the court.

It is the object of the law, among other things, to punish murder and manslaughter, on land, in places within the jurisdiction of the United States; and also to punish murder and manslaughter committed on the ocean. The two crimes of murder and manslaughter, when committed on land, are described in two distinct sections, as two distinct offenses; and the description of the place in one section is complete in itself, and makes no reference to the description of place in the other. The crimes of murder and manslaughter, when committed on water, are also described as two distinct offenses, in two sections, each containing a description of the place in which the offense may be committed, without any reference in the one section to the other. That section which affixes the punishment to manslaughter on the seas, proceeds to describe other offenses which are accessorial in their nature, without any limitation of place. In every section throughout the act, describing a crime, the right to punish which depends on place, and in some instances where the right of punishment does not depend upon place, the legislature has, without any reference to a preceding section, described the place in which it must be committed, in order to bring the offender within 105* the act. This characteristic feature *of the law now to be expounded, deserves great consideration, and affords a powerful reason for restraining the court from annexing to the description contained in one section, parts of the description contained in another. From this review of the examination made of the act at the bar, it appears that the argument chiefly relied on, to prove that the words of one section descriptive of the place ought to be incorporated into another, is the extreme improbability that Congress could have intended to make those differences with respect to place, which their words import. We admit that it is extremely improbable. But probability is not a guide which a court, in construing a penal statute, can safely take. We can conceive no reason why other crimes which are not comprehended in this act should not be punished. But Congress has not made them punishable, and this court cannot enlarge the statute.

After giving the subject an attentive consideration, we are unanimously of opinion that the offense charged in this indictment is not cognizable in the courts of the United States; which opinion is to be certified to the Circuit Court for the District of Pennsylvania.

CERTIFICATE.—This cause came on to be heard on the transcript of the record of the Circuit Court for the District of Pennsylvania, and on the question on which the judges of that court were divided, and was argued by counsel; on consideration whereof, the court is of opinion, that manslaughter committed in a river such as the river Tigris is described *to [*106] be, is not punishable by the laws of the United States, and that the Circuit Court of the United States, for the District of Pennsylvania, has no jurisdiction over the offense. All which is ordered to be certified to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Pennsylvania.<sup>1</sup>

1.—The constitution of the United States declares, that the judicial power of the Union shall extend (among other things) "to all cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction;" and this court has determined, that the power thus granted belongs exclusively to the courts of the United States. Martin v. Hunter, ante, Vol. I., p. 333, 337. It is not the purpose of this note to consider what cases of a civil nature are properly included within the terms, "cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction." As to the criminal jurisdiction of the admiralty, there is no doubt that it is defined by local limits; and in order to ascertain these, it becomes necessary to inquire into the extent of the admiralty jurisdiction of England, from which ours was derived, as that was from the maritime states on the continent of Europe.

Both in England and the other countries of Europe, the Court of Admiralty is a branch which has sprung from that ancient and venerable stock, the office of admiral. The etymology of the word serves to indicate the origin of the office, and the time when it was introduced, at least under that name, into Europe. The word admiral or ammiral, is doubtless derived from the Arabic word emir or amir, signifying a general officer or commander-in-chief, dominus vel prefectum. Du Cange. Glossary. Verbo Admiratus. In the time of the crusades, by means of which so many oriental usages were brought into the west of Europe, it was introduced into France as the title of a commander-in-chief, either of land or sea forces. Accordingly, we find that the office, with that title, was unknown until the third race of French kings, under Charles IV., about the end of the thirteenth century, and it appeared in England about the same period in the reign of Edward I. After the term thus came to be exclusively applied to the commander-in-107* chief of naval forces in France, the station was filled with several illustrious characters, and in the scale of civil and military dignities ranked immediately after the office of constable. The person who filled this high station had jurisdiction, by himself or his deputies, of all crimes and offenses committed on the sea, its ports, harbors, and shores. Valin. Com. sur l'Ordon., l. 1, tit. 2, art. 10, De la Compétence.

In England, the office subsisted with the same title of High Admiral, until the reign of Charles II., when it was filled by his brother, the Duke of York (afterwards James II.), who, being excluded from office as a Catholic by the test act in 1673, it was executed by commissioners, with the same power and authority as belonged to the Lord High Admiral; and since the accession of the house of Hanover, the office has also been vested in commissioners, who are styled the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty. But the King is said still to hold, for certain purposes, the office of Lord High Admiral, though in a capacity distinguishable from his regal character; a distinction of practical importance in the law of prize, but immaterial to the present purpose. The judge of the High Court of Admiralty in England formerly held his place by patent from the Lord High Admiral, but since that office has only existed in contemplation of law, he holds it by direct commission from the crown. The ancient criminal jurisdiction of the court was modified by the statute of the 28th of Henry VIII., ch. 15, which enacted, that offenses upon the seas, and in havens, rivers, &c., should be tried by the admiral or his deputy, and three or four more, among whom two common law judges are usually appointed, the judge of the High Court of Admiralty presiding. 2 Bro. Civ. and Adm. Law, 458. In Scotland, the court is held before the delegate of the High Admiral, who may also name other inferior local deputies, and who is declared to be the King's Justice-General upon the seas, or fresh water within flood and mark, and in all harbors and creeks. 2 Bro. Civ. and Adm. Law, 30.

This remarkable conformity between the origin, history, and nature of the courts of admiralty in France and Great Britain, renders it highly probable that their jurisdiction, both civil and criminal, however it may have been shifted from its ancient *foundations, was originally the same; and [*108] this supposition derives additional strength from the manner in which the history of the two countries is blended together during the middle ages, and from the circumstance of both having derived their maritime institutions from the shores of the Mediterranean.

There appears to be no question that the admiralty jurisdiction of England originally extended to all crimes and offenses committed upon the sea, and in all ports, rivers, and arms of the sea, as far as the tide ebbs and flows. This is established by the ancient inquisitions, the record of which still remain in the black book of the admiralty, and by the articles given in charge at the admiralty sessions, as early as the reign of Edward III. Clerk's Praxis; Roughton's articles, passim; Extton, ch. 11, 12, 13. Selden, de Dom. Mar., l. 2, ch. 24, p. 209. But

[LOCAL LAW.]

M'CLUNG v. ROSS.

Under the laws of Tennessee, where lands are sold by a summary proceeding for the payment of taxes, it is essential to the validity of the sale, and of the deed made thereon, that every fact necessary to give the court jurisdiction should appear upon the record.

Under the statute of limitations of Tennessee, the running of the statute can only be stopped by actual suit, if the party claiming under it has peaceable possession for seven years. But such a possession cannot exist if the party having the better right takes actual possession in pursuance of his right.

One tenant in common may oust his co-tenant, and hold in severalty; but a silent possession, unaccompanied with any act amounting to an ouster, or giving notice to the co-tenant that his possession is adverse, cannot be construed into an adverse possession.

THIS cause was argued by Mr. Williams<sup>1</sup> for the plaintiff in error, and by the Attorney-General and Mr. F. Jones<sup>2</sup> for the defendant.

Lord Coke, in 4 Inst. 135, et seq., after admitting that the admiralty had jurisdiction of all things done upon the sea, endeavors to establish the doctrine, that the sea, ex vi termini, did not include any navigable waters within the body of any county of the realm; and for proof of this, he mainly relies on certain authorities in Fitzherbert's Abridgment (Avovery, 192; Corone, 399), which, when carefully considered, will not support his position. The hostility of Lord Coke to the admiralty, and indeed to every other jurisdiction rivaling the common law courts, is well known; and Mr. Justice Buller has observed, that "with respect to what is said relative to the admiralty jurisdiction in 4 Inst. 135, that part of Lord Coke's work has been always received with great caution, and frequently contradicted. He seems to have entertained not only a jealousy of, but an enmity against that jurisdiction." All the authorities cited by Lord Coke will be satisfactorily disposed of upon the supposition (which Lord Hale asserts to be the fact) that before the thirty-fifth year of Edward III., the common law exercised, even upon the narrow seas, as well as in ports and havens within the ebb and flow of the tide, a concurrent jurisdiction with the admiralty. 2 Hale's P. C. 13 et seq. Neither does the case itself in Fitz. Abr. Corone, 399, 8 Edw. II., warrant Lord Coke's assertion. Stanton, J., is there reported to have said, that it is not an arm of the sea where a [109*] man can see *what is done on the one side of the water and the other; and that the coroner, in such cases, shall exercise his jurisdiction there. This dictum, taken literally, cannot be considered as law, for in the year books (22 Assisarum, 93) it is expressly held, that every water which flows and reflows, is called an arm of the sea, so far as it flows. "Que chescun ewe, que flow et reflow, est appelle bras de mer cy tantant come el flowe." The same doctrine is quoted and confirmed by Lord Hale, who states, that the sea is either that which lies within the body of a county or without; and that an arm or branch of the sea which lies within the faucibus terre, where a man may reasonably discern between shore and shore, is, or at least may be, within the body of a county. Hale, De Jure Mar., ch. 4, p. 10. So that there is the strongest reason to question Lord Coke's authority in this respect, and to adhere to the evidence furnished by the records of the admiralty, of its ancient jurisdiction in ports and havens within the ebb and flow of the tide.

How far this ancient jurisdiction has been altered by statutes, is another question. The statute 13 Richard II., ch. 5, enacts, "that the admirals, and their deputies, shall not meddle henceforth of anything done within the realm, but only of a thing done upon the sea, according as it hath been duly used in the time of the noble King Edward (III.), grandfather of our Lord the King that now is." The statute 15 Richard II., ch. 3, enacts, "that of all manner of contracts, pleas and queables, and of all other things done, or arising within the bodies of counties, as well by land as by water, and also of wreck of the sea, the Admiral's Court shall have no manner of cognizance, power, nor jurisdiction; but all manner of contracts, pleas, and queables, and all other things rising within the bodies of counties, as well by land as by water, as afore, and also wreck of the sea, shall be tried, determined, discussed, and remedied by the laws of the land, and not before, or by the admiral, nor his lieutenants, in any wise. Nevertheless, of the death of a man, and of a mayhem done in great ships, being hovering on the main streams of great rivers, only, beneath the bridges of the same rivers nigh to the sea, and in none other places of the same rivers, the admiral shall have cognizance; and also, to arrest *ships in the great flotes for the great voy- [*110] ages of the King, and of the realm; saving always to the King all manner of forfeitures and profits thereof coming; and he shall also have jurisdiction upon the said flotes during the said voyages, only saving always to the lords, cities, and boroughs, their liberties and franchises." The true limit of the admiralty jurisdiction under these statutes was long a subject of angry contention between the civilians and the common lawyers. But it is admitted on all sides, that on the main or high seas (which, as Blackstone states, begin at the low water-mark, 1 Bl. Comm. 110), the admiralty has jurisdiction exclusive of the common law; and that, between high water-mark and low water-mark, where the sea ebbs and flows (which is technically the shore of the sea, or littus maris, Hale de Jure Mar. ch. 4, p. 12), the common law and the admiralty have a divided empire (divisum imperium) or alternate jurisdiction, one upon the water when it is full sea, the other upon the land, when it is an ebb. 1 Bl. Comm. 110; Constable's case, 5 Co. Rep. 106, 107; Barber v. Whanton, 2 Lord Raym. 1452; 2 East's P. C. 803; 4 Bl. Comm. 268. Upon the sea-coast, therefore, it is incontestible that the body of every county bordering on such coast, is bounded by the shore of the sea, and at no time extends below low water-mark.

But what constitutes the boundary of counties bordering on arms of the sea, and navigable rivers, is a question concerning which great differences of opinion have been expressed. It has been strenuously insisted by the judges of the admiralty, that, notwithstanding the statutes of Richard, the admiralty still continues to possess jurisdiction in all ports, havens, and rivers, where the sea ebbs and flows, below the first bridges. 1 Sir L. Jenkins's Life, xcii; Exton, b. 2, ch. 3 et seq.; Zouch, 92. And Sir Henry Spelman adopts the same opinion. Spelm. Reliq. 226. The ground of this opinion is, that the same rule exists at the common law in respect to the bounds of counties on navigable waters and arms of the sea as is applied by the same law to the sea-coast, viz., that they are limited by the ebb and flow of the tide; and that the statute of Richard was intended *no further to restrict the ad- [*111] miralty than as to crimes committed above the first bridges. 1 Sir L. Jenkins's Life, xcii; Exton, ch. 10 to 20; Zouch, 92. And it cannot be denied, that the agreement of the twelve judges in 1632, cited at large (ante, Vol. III., p. 365, note 4), strongly countenances this pretension. In Rex v. Soleguard (Andrew's Rep. 231), also, Sir Edmund Isham cited an opinion delivered as recently as 1713, on a reference to all the judges, in which ten of them (against Ward, C. B., and Gould, J.,) held, "that the admiralty hath a jurisdiction in all great navigable rivers from the bridges to the sea." And in that case the court did not deny the jurisdiction, but founded their judgment upon a supposed concurrent jurisdiction of the common law. On the other hand, Lord Coke, principally on the authority of the two cases before cited (4 Inst. 140; Fitz. Abr. Avovery, 192, and Corone, 399), maintains that the bodies of counties comprehend all against Charles M'Clung, for 5,000 acres of land, lying in the District of East Tennessee.

At the trial of the cause, the plaintiff in the court below gave in evidence two grants from the state of North Carolina, for the land in controversy, to Stockly Donalson and John Hackett, the one dated the 20th of September, 1787, and the other dated the 22d of February, 1795. He also gave in evidence a deed of conveyance of the said land, purporting to be from Stockly Donalson and John Hackett, dated the 29th of September, 1793, and registered in Hawkins county, Tennessee, on the 27th of December, 1793. The regular registration of this deed, so far as respected Stockly Donalson, was admitted by the defendant. Its registration as to John Hackett was not admitted, and was proved only by the following indorsements:

"December Session, 1793.

This deed was proved in open court, and ordered to record. Test.

This conveyance was registered 27th of December, 1793, in liber G., p. 127, in the register's office of Hawkins county.

THOMAS JACKSON, C. R."

It is stated in the bill of exceptions, that the execution of the deed on the part of Hackett was not proved.

The defendant also claimed under Stockly Donalson; but his deeds being of subsequent date, could confer no title while the deed to Ross remained in force. *For the pur- [*118 navigable waters where persons can see from one side to the other; or rather, as other authorities, with more accuracy, state it, the point, where a man standing on one side of the land, may see what is done on the other side. Hawkins's P. C. ch. 9, sec. 14; 2 East, P. C. 804. Lord Hale appears to speak with great doubt and hesitation on this subject, merely asserting that "an arm or branch of the sea, where a man may reasonably discern between shore and shore, is, or at least may be, within the body of a county." And it may fairly be inferred as well from this cautious expression as from his commentary on the statute of the 28th Hen. VIII., ch. 15 (2 Hale's P. C. 16, 17), that Lord Hale was not satisfied with Lord Coke's exposition of the common law boundary of counties. The whole question, however, became in a great degree unimportant in England after the enactment of the statute of the 28 Hen. VIII., ch. 15, which gave to the High Commission Court (of which the admiral or his deputy is the presiding judge), cognizance of "all treasons, felonies, robberies, murders and confederacies committed in or upon the sea, or in any other haven, river, creek, or place, where the admiral or admirals have, or pretend to have jurisdiction." In the exposition of this statute, Lord Hale says: "This seems to me to extend to great rivers where the sea flows and reflows below the [112*] first bridges, and also in creeks of the sea at full water, where the sea flows and reflows, and upon high water upon the shore, though these possibly be within the body of the country, for there at least by the statute of 15 Rich. II., they (the admirals) have a jurisdiction; and thus, accordingly, it has been held, at all times even when the judges of the common law have been named, and sat in the commission; but we are not to extend the words (pretend to have) to such a pretence as is without any right at all; and, therefore, although the admiral pretend to have jurisdiction upon the shore, when the tide is reflowed, yet he hath no cognizance of a felony committed there." 2 Hale's P. C. 16, 17. This construction of the statute, in opposition to Lord Coke's, was solemnly adopted in a very recent case by the twelve judges; and sentence of death accordingly passed upon the prisoner upon a conviction under the statute. Rex v. Bruce, 2 Leach's C. C. 1093; 4th Ed. cited at large, ante, Vol. III., p. 371, note 1. Sir Leoline Jenkins, in his charge given at the Admiralty Sessions at the Old Bailey, speaking of the commission given to the judges under the statute, says: "But the commission itself explains the word (pretend) in a more particular manner in directing the inquiry to be of things done, not only upon the sea, and in havens, creeks, and rivers, as in the statute, but also in all places whatsoever within the flowing of the water, to the full sea mark; and in all great rivers from those bridges downwards that are next the sea; which words, being in the commission, are the best comment upon the statute, it having so often passed the great seal in these last seven score years, under the view and approbation of so many Lords Chancellors and Keepers, and of so many Attorney-Generals, men of the greatest eminency in the laws of the land, so that the words of the statute, and the commission, being taken together, do not only ascertain the power of this court to hear and determine offenses done in all, or any of those places, but do also declare all and every of the places themselves to be within the jurisdiction of the admiralty; for otherwise, the jurisdiction of the commissioners since the statute would be of larger extent, and in more places than the jurisdiction of the admiral was before the statute, which it is clear was not intended by the law-makers." [*113 1 Sir L. Jenkins, xci. But where such havens, creeks, and rivers, &c., are within the body of a county, it seems now generally agreed that the courts of common law have a concurrent jurisdiction over the same offenses. 2 Hale's P. C. 15, 16; Rex v. Bruce, 2 Leach's C. C. 1093, 4th ed.

Supposing, however, Lord Coke's view of this matter to be correct, the limits of a county will still be confined to places in rivers, creeks, and arms of the sea, which are so narrow as that a person on one side can reasonably discern and attest upon oath anything done on the other side; for the reason assigned for this rule of limitation is, that the pais may there come and take inquisition of the facts. 4 Inst. 140; 2 East's P. C. 804. And, in England the admiralty hath by the express provisions of the statute 15 Rich. II., ch. 3, cognizance of every description of homicide and mayhem, "happening in great ships being and hovering in the main stream of great rivers below the bridges of the same rivers, which (as Blackstone observes), are then a sort of port or haven; such (to use his own illustration), as are the ports of London and Gloucester, though they lie at a great distance from the sea, 4 Bl. Comm. 268, and though they be within the body of a county, 2 Hale's P. C. 16.

But it is certainly very questionable how far the statutes of Richard II. are to be considered as restrictive of the grant of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction contained in the constitution of the United States. These statutes were never designed to apply to the colonies, for at that time the colonies did not exist; and in point of fact, the admiralty jurisdiction in the colonies has always depended entirely upon the royal commission, and upon acts of Parliament expressly extending to them. Hence, the colonial vice-admiralty courts have constantly exercised jurisdiction in many cases, such as revenue cases, of which the High Court of Admiralty in England has not recently taken jurisdiction. I say recently, because it seems that formerly the admiralty in England did take jurisdiction of the breaches of the navigation laws, and other laws of trade; either by the express provisions of those statutes or in virtue of its original maritime jurisdiction. 1 Sir L. Jenkins's Life, lxxii., [*114 xcv., et seq.; 2 Sir L. J., p. 745, 746. But it appears that the colonial vice-admiralty courts have uniformly exercised a jurisdiction over revenue cases upon their original inherent powers by virtue of their commissions, independent of any statute. See a case cited in The Fabius, 6 Rob. 245. Beside, the restrictions contained in the statutes of 13 and 15 Rich. II., as to criminal jurisdiction, are purely arbitrary, and cannot be considered as declaratory of the pre-existing law. What reason is there why the admiralty should have jurisdiction of homicide and mayhem in rivers, ports, and creeks of the sea, and not of other crimes in the same places? Such a limitation has no foundation in the ancient constitution of the court, and never at any time existed independent of the statute. It is also a well-established rule in the construction of English statutes, that they are not to be considered as expose of invalidating this deed, he offered in evidence certain records of the County Court of Rhea, showing that the land had been sold for the non-payment of taxes, had been conveyed by the sheriff to the purchaser, and by the purchaser to the defendant. The regularity of this sale, and the validity of the deeds made in consequence of it, were contested, and the court determined against their validity; to which opinion of the court the counsel for the defendant excepted.

In the year 1803, the legislature of Tennessee passed an act, subjecting all lands to which the Indian claim was extinguished, held by deed, &c., to taxes. The 13th section of the act provides, that "in case there shall not be any goods or chattels on which the sheriff can distress for public taxes, &c., he shall report the same to the court of this county." The court is then directed to make out certain lists, and to direct certain publications, after which the court may enter up judgment, on which execution may issue, and the lands be sold. In 1807 the legislature passed a supplementary act, the 3d section of which enacts, that it shall be the duty of the collector of taxes in each county, after the first day of January in each year, to make report to the court in writing, "of all such tracts or parts of tracts of land as have, from his own knowledge, or from the information of others, not been returned for taxation for the said preceding year; and it shall be the duty of the said court to cause said report to be recorded in books to be kept for that purpose, and to cause judgment to be entered up for double the tax due on the 119"] *said land, not returned for taxation, and so unpaid, and shall order the same to be sold," &c.

In January, 1810, Miller Francis, collector of taxes in Rhea county, for the year 1809, retending to the colonies, unless included by express words, or by inevitable implication (1 Bl. Comm. 107, 108); and it cannot be pretended that the colonies are within the purview or the words of the statutes of the 13 and 15 Richard II. Why, then, should they be considered as extending to the colonies, which did not then exist, any more than to Scotland, which was not then united to the crown, but in which country the admiralty still retains its ancient jurisdiction undiminished?

The commissions issued by the crown to the vice-admiralty courts in the colonies were entirely inconsistent with the limitations imposed upon the admiralty in England. One of the latest, which is probably copied from the others, is that issued to the Governor of New Hampshire, in 6 Geo. III. It empowers him "to take cognizance of, and proceed in all causes, civil and maritime, and in complaints, contracts, offenses or suspected offenses, crimes, pleas, debts, exchanges, accounts, charter-parties, agreements, suits, trespasses, inquiries, extortions, and demands, and all business, civil and maritime, whatsoever, &c., throughout all and every the sea-shores, public streams, ports, fresh waters, rivers, creeks, and arms, as well of the sea as of the rivers and coasts, whatsoever, of the province, &c., and territories dependent thereon, and maritime ports, whatsoever of the same, and thereto adjacent;" and in this commission 115"] *those places are referred to as within "our maritime jurisdiction." De Lovio v. Boit, 2 Gallis. 470, note 47. It seems highly probable that the expression "maritime jurisdiction;" in the constitution, was borrowed from the language of those commissions, and was introduced ex abundanti cautela, and superadded to the term "admiralty," in order to obviate any doubt as to the full extent of the authority meant to be conferred.

Indeed, it has already been, in effect, decided by this court, that the statutes of Richard are not in ported to the court, that the following lands were not listed for taxation for the year 1809, to wit, &c. Then follows a list of several tracts of land, among which is the tract in question, reported three several times in the following terms:

Reputed owners.	Quantity.	No. of title.	Date of title.	Location. Tax.
S. Donalson,	5,000	209	20 Sept. 1787.	Pleasant, &c.
S. Donalson,	5,000	1347	22 Feb. 1795.
John Hackett,
David Ross,	5,000	209	20 Sept. 1787.

Upon the return of which report the court entered up a judgment for the sale of the said lands, and after the publication required by law, an execution was directed, under which the said land was sold as being three distinct tracts; when Robert Farquharson became the purchaser of the tracts reported to belong to Stockly Donalson, and to Stockly Donalson and John Hackett; and the agent of David Ross became the purchaser of the tract reported to belong to David Ross.

A question of considerable difficulty arises on the validity of these sales. Under the act of 1803, the power of the court to render judgment in such cases for the sale of land is founded on there being no personal property from which the tax might be made. The jurisdiction of the court depends on that fact. Whether it is necessary that its existence should be shown in the judgment of the court, is a question on which the state courts appear to have decided differently at different times. But the last, and, we *believe, the correct opin- [*120 ion, reported in 5 Haywood, 394, establishes force in the United States, as limitations of the admiralty and maritime jurisdiction granted in the constitution. By the judiciary act of 1789, ch. 20, sec. 9, seizures under laws of impost, navigation, and trade, on waters navigable from the sea by vessels of ten or more tons burthen, as well as seizures on the high seas, are expressly included in the admiralty and maritime jurisdiction of the district courts. It is evident that Congress could not give the district courts, acting as courts of admiralty, cognizance of any causes which were not "of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction," within the true meaning of the constitution; because, it would deprive the parties of their constitutional right of trial by jury. The objection was, therefore, very early taken, that seizures in ports, and in such navigable waters as above stated, were not causes of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, because those places were not, according to the common law interpretation in England of the statutes of Richard II. within the jurisdiction of the admiralty. But this court has repeatedly overruled the objection (La Vengeance, 3 Dall. 297; The Sally, 2 Cranch, 406; The Betsey and Charlotte, 4 Cranch, 443; The Samuel, ante, Vol. I., p. 9; The Octavia, Ib. p. 20), and thereby established the doctrine that the constitutional admiralty jurisdiction includes ports, arms, and creeks of the sea, as far as the tide ebbs and flows.

The learned reader will observe that this position is not disturbed by the decision of this court in the case in the text (The United States v. Wiltberger), or by that of the United States v. Bevens (ante, Vol. III., p. 336, 337); the only question in those cases being, not what was the constitutional authority of Congress, but how far it had been exercised; not what was the *extent of the [*116 admiralty and maritime jurisdiction granted in the constitution, but how far it had been conferred by Congress upon any particular court of the Union.

the general principle, that in these summary proceedings, every fact which is necessary to give jurisdiction, ought to appear in the record of the court. The act of 1807 directs the court to proceed on the return of the collector, that the taxes of the preceeding year are unpaid, or that the land has not been returned for taxation. Whether this act, which is supplemental to that of 1803, authorizes the court to give judgment for the sale of land, although there may be personal property in the county sufficient to pay the tax, or only varies the mode of proceedings against the land, without varying the circumstances under which it may become liable, is a question which does not appear to have been decided in Tennessee, and which it is unnecessary to decide in this case, because we are all of opinion, that if the sale was valid, Ross is to be considered as the purchaser of his own title, and Farquharson as the purchaser of the title of Donalson and Hackett. The objection to this is, that the agent of Ross stood by and permitted Farquharson to bid. But this objection implies a knowledge on the part of Ross, or his agent, that the land sold in the name of Donalson and Hackett was his land. There is no evidence that either of them possessed this knowledge; nor are the circumstances such as would justify its being presumed. Were the court required to presume fraud on this occasion, it is not to Ross, or to his agent, that the evidence on this particular part of the transaction would justify us in ascribing it. We think, then, that the defendant 121*] ants in the court below *acquired no title to Ross's land by the sheriff's sale or deeds. We think, then, that there was no error in rejecting these deeds.

The defendant also claimed the benefit of the act of limitations, which makes seven years' peaceable and adverse possession a complete bar to the action.<sup>1</sup>

In support of this claim, he relied on the testimony of John Meriott, who swore, that in pursuance of an agreement between him and John Hackett, who informed him that the land 122*] belonged to him (Hackett) *and the defendant, M'Clung; he took possession of the land in March, 1807, built a house, and cleared seven or eight acres, and retained possession of the land until the contract was rescinded. By a contract with M'Clung, he agreed to hold possession for M'Clung and Hackett. It also appeared in evidence that Meriott remained in possession until the autumn of 1808, when he surrendered it to Hackett, who, in the succeeding spring, moved with his family into the house Meriott had built, where he resided until his death, since which event it has been occupied by his widow and family.

The plaintiff then proved, that in 1795 John

Hackett showed this agent of Ross the land in controversy as the land sold to him; that in the year 1813 the same agent agreed to lease a part of the land to one Cox, who, in pursuance of the said agreement, entered thereon, and built a small house, but being threatened by M'Clung with a suit, he abandoned it.

Upon this testimony, the defendant in the Circuit Court moved the court to charge the jury, 1st. That if they believed the possession taken by Meriott to have been on behalf of Hackett and M'Clung, and that Hackett continued said possession for himself and M'Clung, for seven years before suit, it was adverse, and would bar the claim of the lessor of the plaintiff. And farther, that the possession of the land taken by Cox, as tenant of Ross, would not suspend the statute of limitations, and that the effect of the said statute could be defeated only by suit at law.

This instruction the judge refused to give, but did *charge the jury that Hackett *123 was by law a tenant in common with Ross, of which character he could not discharge himself by agreement with a younger purchaser from Donalson, and that the statute would not bar his right. With respect to the occupancy of Cox, the judge said, that merely going upon the land would not stop the running of the statute, but that if an older adverse claimant took actual possession by building houses, clearing land, &c., the operation of the statute of limitations might be thereby suspended. To this opinion, also, the counsel for the defendant excepted.

On examining the whole testimony stated in the bill of exceptions, it appears that the contract with Hackett, which is stated by Meriott in his deposition, was a contract for the sale and purchase of a part of the tract of 5,000 acres sold by Donalson to Ross, and that his contract with M'Clung was a sale of M'Clung's part of the same land, on condition that he would hold the whole tract for M'Clung and Hackett. The actual possession of Meriott, then, does not appear to have extended beyond his purchase. He does not allege that Hackett put him in possession of more land than was sold to him; nor does it appear that M'Clung put him in possession of any land farther than the virtual possession which was to be implied from the agreement which has been stated. The possession of Meriott, then, was an actual possession of a part of the land under a purchase. It was his own possession, in his own right, and not the possession of Hackett and M'Clung. His agreement with M'Clung to hold *the residue of the land for Hackett *124 and M'Clung, never having been followed, so far as is shown to the court, by actual occupation of any part of that residue, cannot, we

1.—The statute of Tennessee of 1797, c. 47, made to settle the true construction of the statute of limitations of North Carolina of 1715, provides, "that in all cases, whenever any person or persons shall have had seven years' peaceable possession of any land, by virtue of a grant, or deed of conveyance founded upon a grant, and no legal claim by suit in law, by such, set up to said land, within the above term, that then and in that case the person or persons so holding possession as aforesaid shall be entitled to hold possession, in preference to all other claimants, such quantity of land as shall be specified in his, or their said grant, or deed of conveyance founded on a grant as aforesaid." The act then proceeds to bar the claim of those who shall neglect, for the term of seven years, to avail themselves of any title they may have.

Under the statute of North Carolina, it had been determined by the courts of that state, that it afforded protection to those only who held by color of title. And under the act of Tennessee, it is settled by the decisions of the local courts, and of this court, that it does not like other statutes of limitation, protect a mere naked possession, but that its operation is to be limited to a possession of seven years, acquired and held under a grant or a deed founded on a grant. Patton's Lessee v. Easton, ante. Vol. I., p. 476.

think, be construed into such a possession by Hackett and M'Clung as to affect the title of Ross. If the defendant cannot avail himself of the possession of Meriott, then it is not shown that the bar was complete when this suit was brought. The contract of sale with Meriott was rescinded in the autumn or winter of 1808, and Hackett entered into the land in the spring of 1809. This suit was instituted on the 27th of March, 1816. The testimony does not show that the entry of Hackett was anterior to the 27th of March, 1809. This, however, ought to be left to the jury. But the judge was of opinion that the possession of Hackett was not adverse to that of Ross, because they were tenants in common.

That one tenant in common may oust his co-tenant and hold in severalty, is not to be questioned. But a silent possession, accompanied with no act which can amount to an ouster, or give notice to his co-tenant that his possession is adverse, ought not, we think, to be construed into an adverse possession. The principles laid down in Barr v. Gratz (4 Wheat., 213) apply to this case.

Neither does it appear to this court that there is error in that part of the charge which respects the occupation of Cox on the part of Ross. It is, that merely going upon the land will not stop the running of the statute, but that if an older adverse claimant took actual possession by building houses, clearing 125* land, &c., the operation of the statute of limitations might be thereby suspended. It has been contended that the statute of Tennessee can be stopped only by actual suit. This is true, when the possession is such as by its continuance to constitute a bar. But to make it such, it must be peaceable for seven years. This is the fact which creates the bar. This fact cannot exist if the person having the better title takes actual possession in pursuance of his right. It is unnecessary to inquire whether the subsequent abandonment of this possession rendered it in this case a nullity, because the point is rendered unimportant by the circumstances that Ross and Hackett were tenants in common. There is, then, no error in the charge so far as respects the statute of limitations.

But the counsel also requested the judge to charge the jury, that the name of Hackett being signed to the deed from Stockly and Donalson to Ross, since the delivery of said deed, amounts to such an alteration or addition as will vitiate such deed, unless accounted for by the plaintiff. This charge, also, the judge refused to give, but did instruct the jury that the title was vested in Ross by the deed from Donalson, and could not be divested, although there might be an alteration or addition in a material part of the said deed, such as the name of Hackett being put to the deed and not proved.

There is some ambiguity in this instruction, and there is some doubt in the state of the fact. The counsel for the defendant assumes the fact that the signature of Hackett was affixed to the 126* deed after its delivery. This does not appear in the evidence as stated. Nor does it appear whether the signature of Hackett was affixed before or after the deed was registered. It was not proved or registered as to Hackett, and is void as to him. The court is not, however, prepared to say, that it is void as to Don-alson. But the instruction given by the judge is in terms which might mislead the jury, and which appear in fact to have misled them. He says that the title was vested in Ross by the deed from Donalson, and could not be divested by the addition of the name of Hackett. Now, this suit was instituted for the whole tract, and the title asserted by Ross was a title to the whole tract. The instruction of the judge might have been understood as informing the jury that the title vested by the deed conformed to the title claimed by Ross. In fact, it was so understood: for the jury found a verdict for the whole tract, and the court gave its judgment for the whole. Now, Ross had no title to more than a moiety, and the judge ought so to have instructed the jury. For this reason, the judgment is to be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

Judgment reversed.

JUDGMENT.—This cause came on to be heard on the transcript of the record of the Circuit Court for East Tennessee, and was argued by counsel. On consideration whereof, it is the opinion of this court that the Circuit Court erred in instructing the jury that the title to the whole tract of land in the proceedings mentioned, and for which judgment was **rendered* in the said Circuit Court, was vested in David Ross, whereas the said court ought to have instructed the jury that only a moiety of the said land was vested in him. It is therefore adjudged and ordered, that the judgment of the said Circuit Court in this case be, and the same is hereby reversed and annulled. And it is further ordered, that the said cause be remanded to the said Circuit Court with directions to issue a venire facias de novo.

JADEMEROWSKY, Claimant.

A question of proprietary interest, on further proof. Restitution decreed.

Captors' costs and expenses ordered to be paid by the claimant, it being his fault that defective documents were put on board.

On further proof, the affidavit of the claimant is indispensably necessary.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of Georgia.

This cause was continued for further proof at February term, 1816, (Vide ante, Vol. I., p. 112). Owing to various accidents, the further proof was not received until the last term, and the cause was now argued upon the further proof then produced and filed. It consisted of invoices of the cargo, bills of lading, accounts of sale, accounts of disbursements, the original correspondence between the **claimant* and Mr. Jones, his agent in London, and the original procuration from the claimant to Mr. Jones, recited in the power given from the latter to Diamond, the supercargo, one of the original papers found on board; to which was added the affidavit of Mr. Jademerowsky, the claimant, verifying the correspondence, and explaining the circumstances of doubt and suspicion which appeared upon the original evidence.

Mr. Harper, for the claimant, recapitulated the facts of the original case, stating that this ship sailed from London under Russian colors in April, 1814, joined a British convoy at Portsmouth, and sailed for Barbadoes, where she arrived, and having again sailed bound to the Havanna, was captured on the latter voyage by a British cruiser, carried in for adjudication, and acquitted. She changed her destination for Amelia Islands, and was captured by an American cruiser. At the hearing in the District Court, the ship was restored by consent, and the cargo acquitted; but the latter was condemned on appeal to the Circuit Court, the origin of the adventure not being traced further than London, and it being supposed to be enemy's property concealed under a Russian garb. He argued, from the further proof, that all the circumstances of suspicion arising from the original evidence were now satisfactorily explained, and that consequently the claimant was entitled to restitution.

The Attorney-General, contra, insisted that the farther proof now produced was insufficient to satisfy the doubts originally existing in the cause. The ship was captured in the same year with the St. Nicholas<sup>1</sup> and the Fortuna,<sup>2</sup> and under circumstances strikingly similar. They were all sailing under Russian colors, and documented as Russian vessels; but exclusively directed by British merchants, professing to be the mere agents of the neutral claimants. Even some of the same parties also appear in this case; and the captors have a right to look into these other cases in order to bring this circumstance to the notice of the court.<sup>3</sup> The documents now produced are not such, nor verified in such a manner, as the court had a right to expect. It is not difficult to conceive what fate such documents would have experienced had they been offered in a similar case to Sir W. Scott, after the eloquent description he has given, in the case last cited,<sup>4</sup> of the inexhaustible ingenuity with which new arts are invented to cover enemy's property under a neutral garb; and the jealous rigor with which, in very suspicious cases, he examines the documents offered to his inspection. In another case, he says, "goods shipped in the enemy's country are to be considered prima facie as the property of the enemy, and can only be taken out of that presumption by fair and unbiassed evidence, and not from evidence supplied only from the enemy."<sup>5</sup> But the greater part of the evidence in the present case comes from that source, and is liable to that objection.

Mr. D. B. Ogden, for the claimant, in reply, argued, that as this court, in granting the order for further proof, had not stated what were the doubts to be explained by the claimant, it was sufficient if he had satisfactorily answered those suggested in the opinion of the Circuit Court. The claimant has given such an answer to those doubts, both by the production of documentary evidence, and by his own affidavit, which, it is admitted, is indispensably necessary in order to guard against the inferences that might otherwise fairly be drawn from his silence. The documents are duly verified; and that not merely by his agents in the enemy's country, but by his own oath, and by other testimony.

Mr. Justice JOHNSON delivered the opinion of the court: When this case was first brought to the view of this court, it was accompanied by some others, in which Russian claimants presented themselves under circumstances which satisfied this court that their claims were false and fraudulent. On comparing those cases with this, there was such a striking similitude in their machinery that it was impossible not to suspect that they were all fashioned upon the same model, and adapted to the same end. With The St. Nicholas<sup>6</sup> and The Fortuna,<sup>7</sup> full in view, this court could not adjudge the case of this vessel to be a case of restitution. Still, however, there was a possibility that those may have been the forged copies, and *this the genuine prototype. This [*131 court, therefore, trusting that a Russian character of high standing could not have pledged himself for the fairness of the transaction, but without better evidence than was then presented to our view, gave the most liberal indulgence for procuring evidence to support the claim. We now express our satisfaction in having done so, inasmuch as it has enabled an honest man both to save his property, and vindicate his reputation. And we cannot omit this opportunity to remark, how much it becomes the interest, as well as principles of the fair neutral, to discountenance the conduct of him who indulges himself in fraudulent practices. The claimant in this case had nearly fallen a sacrifice to the bad faith of some of his countrymen; a great loss from it he must unavoidably incur. For, this is one of those cases in which, by the course of the admiralty, we shall be obliged to throw the costs and expenses upon the claimant, although we decree restitution. It is altogether upon the evidence of Jones, and the test-affidavit of the claimant, introducing and verifying their original correspondence, that restitution is now decreed. Unsupported, and unexplained by the evidence introduced as further proof, the condemnation was unavoidable. It is, therefore, the claimant's misfortune, not that of the captors, that the agent Jones had furnished the vessel with the defective documents which accompanied her.

Decree reversed.

DECREE.—This cause came on to be heard on the transcript of the record of the Circuit Court for the District of Georgia, and [*132 on the further proof exhibited in this cause, and was argued by counsel. On consideration whereof, it is decreed and ordered, that the decree of the Circuit Court for the District of

THE LONDON PACKET.

MERINO, Claimant.

A question of proprietary interest on farther proof. Restitution decreed, with costs and expenses to be paid by the claimant.

In general, the circumstance of goods being found on board an enemy's ship raises a legal presumption that they are enemy's property.

THIS was the claim of a Spanish subject to a parcel of hides laden on board of the London Packet, a British ship, at the port of Buenos Ayres, in South America, in the month of June, 1813. The London Packet, on her voyage to London, was captured by the private 133* armed brig the Argus, and carried *into Boston for adjudication. On being libeled in the District Court as a prize of war, the consul of His Catholic Majesty filed a claim for the property in question in favor of Don Jeronimo Merino, a Spanish subject. The District Court condemned the vessel and the whole of the cargo, except these hides, which were restored to the claimant, the court being satisfied there was not such proof of enemy's property therein as to authorize a decree of condemnation. For the ship and residue of the cargo no claim was interposed. From this decree, as to the hides, there was an appeal by the captors to the Circuit Court, where the same was reversed. The court, although it reversed the sentence which had been pronounced below, expressed its entire satisfaction as to the national character and domicile of the claimant, and that the hides had been originally shipped by him; but condemned the property, because, on the order for farther proof, no affidavit had been offered, either of the claimant or his confidential agent, or clerk, of his interest in the cargo at the time of the shipment. It was considered, that the absence of such a document, so universally expected and required by prize tribunals, unavoidably threw a suspicion over the cause, and being wholly unaccounted for, it authorized a belief that there had been a voluntary, if not a studied omission on the claimant's part. At the same term in which the sentence of reversal was pronounced, but not until after such sentence was known, the affidavit of the claimant, which had been received since the last adjournment of the court, was produced by the 134* Spanish consul, with a petition *that the decree might be rescinded, for the purpose of admitting it into the case, or that the same might be so far opened, for the consideration of the court, as to make the affidavit of Merino a part of the evidence therein, so as to accompany the other testimony in the appeal to this court. Upon this application the Circuit Court ordered that the affidavit should be received by the clerk, and sent up with the other papers de bene esse, subject to the directions of this court. The affidavit had been taken on an order below for further proof, but had not been received, as has been stated, when the decree of condemnation was pronounced.<sup>1</sup>

Mr. Webster and Mr. Pitman, for the captors, argued, that it was a well-settled principle in the prize court that the onus probandi lies on the claimant. "In the prize court," says Sir Wm. Scott, "where special reasons for deception are perpetually occurring, and where the court exercises a much more unconfined jurisdiction on questions of property than it exercises in its civil forum, proof of property lies generally on the claimant, and he may be called upon to support the prima facie evidence of a good title which is already exhibited."<sup>2</sup>

This burden would have rested on the claimant in the present case if the goods in question had been found on board of a neutral ship; but it is increased by the fact that the property was found on board an enemy's ship, and an enemy's *armed ship. The maxim as [*135] laid down by Grotius, is: "Res hostium navibus presumuntur esse hostium, donec contrarium probetur." A presumption which, nevertheless, may be destroyed by strong proofs to the contrary.<sup>3</sup> In this case, the property was not only found on board an enemy's armed ship, but was unaccompanied by the documentary evidence required to prove its neutrality. No papers were found at the time of capture relating to the cargo, except the bills of lading; and all the letters and invoices were sunk by the order of the master of the London Packet, in the letter-bag, as sworn by two of the crew upon their examination on the standing interrogatories. The spoliation of papers is therefore superadded to the fact of the property being found on board a ship of the enemy, destined to an enemy's port; and the claimant is called upon to produce the strongest and most satisfactory proof to destroy the many presumptions arising from these facts, that, in truth, the property belongs to the enemy. The claimant has had abundant opportunity afforded him to produce this proof. The first order for further proof was made in the District Court the 26th of November, 1813, and the claimant was indulged until nearly the close of the year 1815, in the courts below, to establish the verity of his claim. Having failed so to do, this court afforded him further time, and he has had from February, 1816, until this term, a period of four years, to produce plenary proof in reference *to a claim so much indulged, [*136] and surrounded with so many circumstances of suspicion. If the claimant has failed to produce this proof, the presumption is irresistible that his claim must be false. In such a suspicious case, too, something more is to be expected from the claimant himself than a mere test affidavit,<sup>1</sup> which is all the evidence (coming from himself) which the claimant has yet furnished.

Mr. D. B. Ogden and Mr. Winder, contra, admitted the rule of the prize court, that property found on board an enemy's vessel is presumed to be enemy's property; but, for this very reason, they insisted, such a vessel would seldom be made the vehicle of enemy's property intended to be covered as neutral. The records of the court would show that in a great majority of the cases, where attempts have been made to disguise enemy's property, such attempts have been made by lading the goods on board a neutral vessel, in order to avoid that suspicion on which the rule of law is founded. But in this case, the presumption itself can have but little weight; because it appears in evidence that the claimant was compelled, by necessity, to lade his goods on board an enemy's vessel, there being at that time none but British ships at Buenos Ayres, destined for Europe, for which market his goods were intended. Some indulgence is due to the subjects of neutral states, who, not having sufficient shipping of their own to carry on their trade, are compelled to resort to the navigation of 137* other countries, *which may happen to be belligerent. Nor can the circumstance of a spoliation of papers by the enemy master have any unfavorable effect upon the claim of a neutral shipper conducting bona fide.<sup>2</sup> Even the actual resistance of the enemy master will not preclude the neutral shipper from receiving restitution, unless he participates in such resistance, and thus forfeits the privileges of his neutral character.<sup>3</sup> The counsel on both sides also argued upon the facts with great minuteness and ability.

Mr. Justice LIVINGSTON delivered the opinion of the court: In the argument of this cause, the counsel have not confined themselves to the effect which the affidavit of the claimant ought of itself to have upon the decision of it, but have animadverted on all the testimony below. The court has, therefore, also extended its examination to all the proofs in the cause, and will now pronounce its judgment on them.

The captured vessel was confessedly British property, as well as a great part of its cargo, and its destination was to a port in the enemy's country, which raises a legal presumption that the property claimed was not neutral. It is not denied that a neutral may use the vessel of a belligerent, for the transportation of his goods, and whatever presumption may arise from the circumstance, that it is not of itself a cause of condemnation. In this case, it does not appear, nor was it probably the fact, that any 138* neutral vessel *bound to London was then at Buenos Ayres, and, therefore, this presumption ought to have but little influence on the present decision. If the proprietary interest be satisfactorily made out, the claimant is entitled to restitution.

There was no letter found on board from Merino to his correspondent in London, nor any invoice of this property. The only document relating to it was a bill of lading in Spanish, dated the 19th of June, 1813, purporting that 6,276 hides had been shipped on board the London Packet, by Jeronimo Merino, on his account and risk, to be delivered to Antonio Daubana, or in his absence to William Heiland, they paying the freight therein stipulated. This bill of lading was not signed by the master. To the omission of a signature to this bill of lading, much importance cannot be attached. It was found in possession of the master, and serving only as a memorandum for him of the cargo on board; and not being intended to pass into the hands of any other persons, it was a matter of indifference whether he put his name to it or not. Of seven bills of lading which were found on board, no less than three were without his signature. Those which were delivered to the shippers were, no doubt signed, which was all that was necessary for their security. If this bill of lading be compared with the one produced, and proved by Daubana, it is impossible not to be struck with the exact similarity between them. They correspond in all respects, excepting only that one has not the signature of the captain, and appears most manifestly to have been filled up with the same ink, and in the *same handwriting, and at *139 the same time; which is no small proof of their being contemporaneous acts, and of the authenticity of the one which is now produced by the consignee. But no letter from Merino to his correspondent, nor any invoice, nor any bill of lading for the consignee, being found on board, it is urged that the proof of proprietary interest is defective, and that the sentence of condemnation ought therefore to be affirmed. Had no further proof been introduced, relieving the case from this difficulty, the argument would be entitled to great consideration. But the absence of those papers is now accounted for. It appears by the testimony of Stevenson, a passenger on board the London Packet, who was examined by the captors, that a large bag, containing a great number of private letters, and other papers, was sunk by order of the master of the London Packet, about half an hour before his vessel was taken. It is then but a fair presumption that the letter, invoice, and bill of lading transmitted by Merino to his correspondent in London, were among the papers thus destroyed. The loss of these papers being thus accounted for, and the master of the captured ship not being brought in as he ought to have been, there was a propriety under the peculiar circumstances of this case, in affording, as the court below did, an opportunity to the Spanish owner of offering subsidiary proof respecting the property mentioned in the bill of lading found on board, and which was claimed by him. This farther proof, which consists of documents from the custom-houses at Buenos Ayres, of the positive testimony *of Mr. *140 Daubana, the consignee in London, and of the test-affidavit of Mr. Merino himself, is satisfactory that the proprietary interest of these hides was, at the time of shipment and of capture, in the claimant. That they belonged to Smith notwithstanding the mark of S. on some of them, as has been suggested, cannot be believed. On that supposition, his conduct is utterly inexplicable. If the adventure was on his account, the disguise of the shipment could have been intended for no other purpose than to impose, as to them, on the courts of the United States; for this contrivance or cover could not protect his vessel from capture and condemnation. Yet, if we believe some of the witnesses, Smith declared that the whole of the cargo belonged to himself and some merchants in London. These declarations of Smith, as he was set at liberty by the captain of the Argus, and, of course, not examined on the standing interrogatories, ought not to militate against the integrity of the present claim; but if they were really made, they afford strong evidence, that if this bill of lading were designed as a cover for belligerent property, some other person, and not Smith, was to be benefited by it. For if he were the real owner, why, it may be asked, did he voluntarily abandon the property (for he was put on board of another vessel, at his own request) at the very moment when this fraud, if he ever intended to avail himself of it, was to be consummated? Why did he not remain in his vessel until her arrival in the United States, and apply to a Spanish Consul, or some other gentleman, to prefer a 141 claim in favor of the pretended Spanish owner? Why did he not support this claim with his own oath, as he must have intended to do if he ever intended to derive any advantage from a contrivance which must have had its inception at Buenos Ayres, at his instigation, and for his emolument? There is no accounting for his conduct on any other hypothesis than that he had no interest in this property, and was therefore willing to leave it to its fate.

The counsel for the captors, aware of the full and conclusive nature of the proof, so far as it establishes Merino's interest in the merchandise claimed by him, have endeavored to show that Merino was not at Buenos Ayres where this shipment took place, and if he was, that it is impossible that his letter, which bears date the 10th of July, 1813, could have been put on board of the London Packet, which had sailed on the 24th of June, fourteen days before. If this be so, a gross attempt has been made to impose on the court, which ought to be followed with consequences fatal to the present claim. But the court is not of opinion that either of these suppositions is supported by the evidence. Not a single witness, whose testimony is relied on to establish the fact of Merino's not being at Buenos Ayres at the time of the shipment, speaks with any certainty, or tells us affirmatively where he then was. This negative testimony, which, if it stood alone and uncontradicted, might excite a strong suspicion, is rendered of very little consequence, by much proof of a contrary character. The custom-house document which has already been referred to, establishes the residence of Merino at Buenos Ayres at the date of the shipment; so does the affidavit of Merino himself, who is proved to be a gentleman of character, of property, and respectability. Daubana also swears to the same fact, with as much certainty as one correspondent can establish the domicile of another residing at so great a distance from each other. He proves that Merino remained there until the 15th of August following, at least, that he received a letter from him, dated at Buenos Ayres on that day. Another witness, who saw him at Rio Janeiro in the year 1814, says, that he did not leave Buenos Ayres until after the middle of the year 1813. The weight of testimony, therefore, may be considered as in favor of the claimant being at Buenos Ayres when this shipment was made. Nor is it so certain, as seemed to be taken for granted at the bar that the London Packet sailed on her voyage for Europe on the 24th of June, 1813. It is true, that the cook, and some others who were examined in preparatorio, fix the time of her departure to that day; but the second mate, and only officer of the captured vessel who was examined, and who was most likely to know, says that she sailed in the month of July. Under this uncertainty respecting a fact which is deemed so material, and to which the claimant's attention has never been called, it cannot be expected that the court should not only act upon it, as positively proved, but follow it up with the condemnation of property so clearly proved to belong to a neutral. It would be more charitable, and not unreasonable, even if the fact were proved, to presume that witnesses were speaking of the time of the London Packet's first weighing anchor at Buenos Ayres, and that she may for some reason or other have been detained in the river until the 10th of July, which is the date of Merino's first letter to his correspondent in London. It may be added that it is not easy to believe that if a fraud were intended, care would not have been taken to make the letter of advice, and all the other papers, correspond with the time of the departure of the vessel.

Upon the whole, a majority of the judges are of opinion, that upon the farther proof the sentence of the Circuit Court should be reversed, and the property restored to the claimant. But as the captors have been put to great expense in consequence of the imperfect documents found on board, and the great delay which has attended the production of the further proof, they are of opinion that their costs and expenses must be paid by the claimant.

Decree reversed.

DECREE.—This cause came on to be heard on the transcript of the record of the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Massachusetts, and the farther proof exhibited in this cause, and was argued by counsel. On consideration whereof, it is decreed and ordered, that the decree of the Circuit Court for the District of Massachusetts in this case, condemning six thousand two hundred and seventy-six ox hides, as good and lawful prize to the libellants, be, and the same is hereby reversed and annulled. And this court, proceeding to pass such decree as the said Circuit Court should have passed, it is further decreed and ordered, that the said six thousand two hundred and seventy-six ox hides be restored to the claimant. And it is further decreed that the said claimant pay to the libellants the costs and expenses incurred in the prosecution of this suit.

THE UNITED STATES v. KLINTOCK.

A commission issued by Anry, as "Brigadier of the Mexican republic" (a republic whose existence is unknown and unacknowledged), or as Generalissimo of the Floridas" (a province in the possession of Spain), will not authorize armed vessels to make captures at sea.

Quære, Whether a person acting with good faith under such a commission may be guilty of piracy.

However, this may be, in general; under the particular circumstances of this case, showing that the seizure was made, not jure belli, but animo furandi, the commission was held not to exempt the prisoner from the charge of piracy.

The act of the 30th of April, 1790, c. 36, s. 8, extends to all persons, on board all vessels, which throw off their national character by cruising piratically, and committing piracy on other vessels.

THIS was an indictment in the Circuit Court of Virginia, against Ralph Klintock, a citizen of the United States, charging him with a piracy committed on the high seas, in April, 1818, on a vessel called the Norberg, belonging to persons to the jurors unknown. He was found guilty generally.

The facts stated were, that the prisoner is a citizen of the United States; that the vessel in which he sailed as first lieutenant was called 145* the *Young *Spartan*; was owned without the United States, and cruised under a commission from Anry, styling himself Brigadier of the Mexican Republic and Generalissimo of the Floridas, granted at Fernandina, after the United States government took possession of it. That he was convicted of a piracy, committed on the Norberg, a Danish vessel, in consequence of practicing the following fraud upon her: The second officer of the privateer brought on board some Spanish papers, which he concealed in a locker, and then affected to have found them on board. The vessel was then taken possession of, the whole original ship's company left on an island on the coast of Cuba, and the second officer being put in command, took the name of the original captain, sailed for Savannah, and entered her there, personating the Danish captain and crew. The Young Spartan followed, and put into a port in the vicinity.

The counsel for the prisoner moved, that the judgment be arrested on the following grounds:

First. That Anry's commission exempts the prisoner from the charge of piracy.

Second. That the fraud practiced on the Dane does not support the charge of piracy, as an act piratically done, and not in the exercise of belligerent rights.

Third. That the prisoner is not punishable under the provisions of the 8th section of the act of 1790.<sup>1</sup>

146* Fourth. That the act of the 30th of April, 1790, 8th section, entitled, "an act for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States," does not extend to an American citizen entering on board of a foreign vessel, committing piracy upon a vessel exclusively owned by foreigners.

Upon these errors in arrest of judgment, the judges of the Circuit Court were divided in opinion, and directed the points, with their division thereon, to be certified to this court.

The Attorney-General, for the United States, argued, 1. That although the government and courts of the United States had acknowledged the fact of the existence of the new states in Spanish America, so as to legitimate the war between them and the parent *country,<sup>2</sup> [*147 yet Mexico was not among the provinces in actual revolt, nor was any such state, de facto, known to exist as the Mexican republic, under the authority of which the commission in question was issued. And even if there were such a power in existence exercising all the rights of war, Denmark is not at war with it, or with any other of the Spanish American provinces. 2. Although the fraud practiced on the Dane may not be in itself an act of piracy, yet the seizure was a piratical act, and the ingredient of fraud cannot change its character for the better. 3. Neither is the prisoner protected by the decision of this court in the case of The United States v. Palmer.<sup>3</sup> That case merely decides, that the crime of robbery committed on board a ship belonging to subjects of a foreign power, by a foreigner, is not piracy, within the act of the 30th of April, 1790, c. 36, s. 8. But it does not decide that the same offense, committed by a citizen on board of a vessel not belonging to the subjects of any foreign power, is not piracy. The vessel on board of which the crime was committed, does not belong to any particular nation. A pirate, being hostis humani generis, is of no nation or state. He, and his confederates, and the vessel on board of which they sail, are outcasts from the society of nations. All the states of the world are engaged in a tacit alliance against them. An offense committed by them against any *individual nation is an offense against [*148 all. It is punishable in the courts of all. So, in the present case, the offense committed on board a piratical vessel, by a pirate, against a subject of Denmark, is an offense against the United States, which the courts of this country are authorized and bound to punish.

Mr. Winder, contra, contended, that this case was decided by that of The United States v. Palmer. The only argument which can be urged for extracting this case out of that decision is, that the prisoner, in the present case, is a citizen of the United States, although the offense itself was committed on board of a foreign vessel. But the whole reasoning of the court in Palmer's case, as well as the certificate of the judgment, shows, that in order to constitute

1.—Which provides, "That if any person or persons shall commit, upon the high seas, or in any river, haven, basin, or bay, out of the jurisdiction of any particular state, murder or robbery, or any other offense, which, if committed within the body of a county, would, by the laws of the United States, be punishable with death; or if any captain or mariner of any ship or other vessel, shall piratically and feloniously run away with such ship or vessel, or any goods or merchandise, to the value of fifty dollars, or yield up such ship or vessel voluntarily to any pirate; or if any seaman shall lay violent hands upon his commander, thereby to hinder and prevent his fighting in defense of his ship, or goods committed to his trust, or shall make a revolt in the ship; every such offender shall be deemed, taken, and adjudged to be a pirate and felon, and being thereof convicted, shall suffer death; and the trial of crimes committed on the high seas, or in any place out of the jurisdiction of any particular state, shall be in the district where the offender is apprehended, or into which he may be first brought."

the offenses enumerated in the statute, it is indispensably necessary, not that the party should be a citizen, but that the vessel against which, and the vessel on board of which the offense is committed, should belong to citizens. It is insisted on the other side, that although the vessel now in question, does not belong to citizens of the United States, yet she does not belong to any particular foreign nation; and, therefore, does not fall within the letter of the authority referred to. But if by her not belonging to any particular foreign state, it be meant that she is a piratical vessel, then the case falls within the late act of 1819, providing for the punishment of piracy as defined by the law of nations, and 149*] not within the act of 1790. If it *falls within the act of 1790, then the act of 1819 is entirely superfluous. But that act was made to provide for the very defect in the former law which was for the first time discovered in the case of Palmer; and it is impossible, consistently with the authority of that case, to bring the present case within the statute, which was the only law in force, on the subject, at the time when this offense was committed.

Mr. Chief Justice MARSHALL delivered the opinion of the court: The first and second points made by the counsel for the prisoner may be considered together.

As judgment can be arrested only for errors apparent on the record, we should feel no difficulty in certifying our opinion of the insufficiency of these on that ground, were we not persuaded that from some inattention, the questions which arise properly on a motion for a new trial, have been stated by the clerk as a motion in arrest of judgment, and that the same points, if undecided now, will recur when judgment is about to be pronounced. In a criminal case especially, we think it proper to decide the question on its real, as well as technical merits.

So far as this court can take any cognizance of that fact, Aury can have no power, either as Brigadier of the Mexican Republic, a republic of whose existence we know nothing, or as Generalissimo of the Floridas, a province in the possession of Spain, to issue commissions to authorize private or public vessels to make captures at sea. Whether a person acting with good faith under such commission, may or may not be guilty of piracy; we are all of opinion 150*] *that the commission can be no justification of the fact stated in this case. The whole transaction taken together, demonstrates that the Norberg was not captured jure belli, but seized and carried into Savannah animo furandi. It was not a belligerent capture, but a robbery on the high seas. And although the fraud practiced on the Dane may not of itself constitute piracy, yet it is an ingredient in the transaction which has no tendency to mitigate the character of the offense.

The third and fourth errors assigned in arrest of judgment may also be considered together. The questions they suggest arise properly on the indictment, and require a reconsideration of the opinion given by the court in Palmer's case.

The question propounded to the court in that case was in these words: "Whether the crime of robbery, committed by persons who are not citizens of the United States, on the high seas, on board of any ship or vessel belonging exclusively to the subjects of any foreign state or sovereignty, or upon the person of any subject of any foreign state or sovereignty, not on board of any ship or vessel belonging to any subject or citizen of the United States, be a robbery or piracy within the true intent and meaning of the said 8th section of the act of Congress aforesaid, and of which the Circuit Court of the United States hath cognizance, to hear, try, determine, and punish the same."

The same question was again propounded, so varied only as to comprehend the offense if committed *by American citizens in a [*151 vessel belonging to foreigners.

The court, in concluding its exposition of the act, thus sums up its opinion: "The court is of opinion that the crime of robbery, committed by a person on the high seas, on board of any ship or vessel belonging exclusively to subjects of a foreign state, on persons within a vessel belonging exclusively to subjects of a foreign state, is not a piracy within the true intent and meaning of the act for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States." The certificate of the court conforms entirely to this opinion.

This opinion and certificate apply exclusively to a robbery or murder committed by a person on board of any ship or vessel belonging exclusively to subjects of a foreign state. It is, we think, the obvious import of these words, that, to bring the person committing the murder or robbery within them, the vessel on board which he is, or to which he belongs, must be at the time, in point of fact, as well as right, the property of the subjects of a foreign state, who must have at the time, in virtue of this property, the control of the vessel. She must at the time be sailing under the flag of a foreign state, whose authority is acknowledged. This is the case which was presented to the court; and this is the case which was decided. We are satisfied that it was properly decided.

But the reasoning which conducted the court to this conclusion is founded on sections of the act, the general words of which ought to be restricted to offenses committed by persons who, at the time of *committing them, [*152 were within the ordinary jurisdiction of the United States; and the language employed may well be understood to indicate an opinion that the whole act must be limited in its operation to offenses committed by, or upon, the citizens of the United States. Upon the most deliberate reconsideration of that subject, the court is satisfied that general piracy, or murder, or robbery, committed in the places described in the 8th section, by persons on board of a vessel not at the time belonging to the subjects of any foreign power, but in possession of a crew acting in defiance of all law, and acknowledging obedience to no government whatever, is within the true meaning of this act, and is punishable in the courts of the United States. Persons of this description are proper objects for the penal code of all nations; and we think that the general words of the act of Congress applying to all persons whatsoever, though they ought not to be so construed as to extend to persons under the acknowledged authority of a foreign state, ought to be so construed as to comprehend those who acknowledge the authority of no state. Those general terms ought not to be applied to offenses committed against the particular sovereignty of a foreign power; but we think they ought to be applied to offenses committed against all nations, including the United States, by persons who by common consent are equally amenable to the laws of all nations.

CERTIFICATE.—This cause came on to be heard on the transcript of the record from the 153 Circuit Court *for the District of Georgia, and was argued by counsel. On consideration whereof, this court is of opinion:

1st. That Aury's commission does not exempt the prisoner from the charge of piracy.

2d. That although the fraud practiced on the Dane may not in itself support the charge of piracy, the whole transaction, as stated in the indictment and in the facts inserted in the record, does amount to piracy.

3d. That the prisoner is punishable under the provisions of the 8th section of the act of 1790.

4th. That the act of the 30th of April, 1790, does extend to all persons on board all vessels which throw off their national character by cruising piratically and committing piracy on other vessels.

THE UNITED STATES v. SMITH.

The act of the 3d of March, 1819, c. 76, s. 5, referring to the law of nations for a definition of the crime of piracy, is a constitutional exercise of the power of Congress to define and punish that crime.

The crime of piracy is defined by the law of nations with reasonable certainty.

Robbery, or forcible depredation, upon the sea, animo furandi, is piracy by the law of nations, and by the act of Congress.

THIS was an indictment for piracy against the prisoner, Thomas Smith, before the 154 Circuit Court of *Virginia, on the act of Congress of the 3d of March, 1819, c. 76.<sup>1</sup>

The jury found a special verdict as follows: "We, of the jury, find, that the prisoner, Thomas Smith, in the month of March, 1819, and others were part of the crew of a private armed vessel, called the Creollo (commissioned by the government of Buenos Ayres, a colony then at war with Spain), and lying in the port of Margaritta; that in the month of March, 1819 the said prisoner and others of the crew mutinied, confined their officer, left the vessel, and in the said port of Margaritta, seized by violence a vessel called the Irresistible, a private armed vessel, lying in that port, commissioned by the government of Artigas, who was also at war with Spain; that the said prisoner and others, having so possessed themselves of the said vessel, the Irresistible, appointed their officers, proceeded to sea on a cruise, without any documents or commission whatever; and while on that cruise, in the month of April, 1819, on the high seas, committed the offense charged in the indictment, by the plunder and robbery of the Spanish vessel therein mentioned. If the plunder and robbery aforesaid be piracy under the act of the Congress of the United States, entitled, 'An act to protect the commerce of the *United States, and punish the [*155 crime of piracy,' then we find the said prisoner guilty; if the plunder and robbery above stated be not piracy under the said act of Congress, then we find him not guilty."

The Circuit Court divided on the question whether this be piracy as defined by the law of nations, so as to be punishable under the act of Congress, of the 3d of March, 1819, and thereupon the question was certified to this court for its decision.

The Attorney-General, for the United States contended, that Congress, by referring to the law of nations for a definition of the crime of piracy, had duly exercised the power given them by the constitution, "to define and punish piracies and felonies committed on the high seas, and offenses against the law of nations." By this reference they adopt the definition of the offense given by the writers on public law. All these writers concur in defining it to be depredation on the seas, without the authority of a commission, or beyond its authority.<sup>2</sup> If there be any defect of precision or slight uncertainty in the definitions of the crime of piracy given by different writers on the law of nations, it is no more than what is to be found in common law writers on the crime of murder. Yet we are constantly referred *by [*156 the legislature to the common law for the definition of murder and other felonies which are mentioned in statutory provisions. But there is no defect in the definition of piracy by the authorities to which we are referred by this act. The definition given by them is certain, consistent, and unanimous; and pirates being hostes humani generis, are punishable in the tribunals of all nations. All nations are engaged in a league against them for the mutual defense and safety of all. This renders it the more fit and proper that there should be a uniform rule as to the definition of the crime, which can only be drawn from the law of nations, as the only code universally known and recognized by the people of all countries.

Mr. Webster, contra, argued, that the special verdict did not contain sufficient facts to enable the court to pronounce the prisoner guilty of the offense charged. The facts found do not necessarily infer his guilt, but, on the contrary, are consistent with his innocence; inasmuch as it appears that he was one of the crew of a vessel belonging to Buenos Ayres, although not acting at the time when the supposed offense was committed under the commission of that colony, but acting as a non-commissioned captor, and as such, seizing the property of Spanish subjects on the high seas. But even supposing the offense to be well found by the special verdict, it cannot be punished under this act, because the law is not a constitutional exercise of the power of Congress to define the crime of piracy. Congress is bound to define 157* it in terms, and is not at liberty to leave it to be ascertained by judicial interpretation. To refer to the law of nations for a definition of the crime, is not a definition; for the very thing to be ascertained by the definition, is the law of nations on the subject. The constitution evidently presupposes that this crime, and other offenses committed on the high seas, were not defined with sufficient precision by the law of nations, or any other law, to form a rule of conduct; or it would merely have given Congress the power of punishing these offenses, without also imposing upon it the duty of defining them. The writers on public law do not define the crime of piracy with precision and certainty. It was this very defect which rendered it necessary that Congress should define, in terms, before it proceeded to exercise the power of punishing the offense. Congress must define it as the constitution has defined treason, not by referring to the law of nations in one case, or to the common law in the other, but by giving a distinct, intelligible explanation of the nature of the offense in the act itself.

Mr. Justice STORY delivered the opinion of the court: The act of Congress upon which this indictment is founded provides, "that if any person or persons whatsoever, shall upon the high seas, commit the crime of piracy, as defined by the law of nations, and such offender or offenders shall be brought into, or found in the United States, every such offender or offenders shall, upon conviction thereof, &c., be punished with death."

158* The first point made at the bar is, whether this enactment be a constitutional exercise of the authority delegated to Congress upon the subject of piracies. The constitution declares that Congress shall have power "to define and punish piracy and felonies committed on the high seas, and offenses against the law of nations." The argument which has been urged in behalf of the prisoner is, that Congress is bound to define, in terms, the offense of piracy, and is not at liberty to leave it to be ascertained by judicial interpretation. If the argument be well founded, it seems admitted by the counsel that it equally applies to the 8th section of the act of Congress of 1790, ch. 9, which declares, that robbery and murder committed on the high seas shall be deemed piracy; and yet, notwithstanding a series of contested adjudications on this section, no doubt has hitherto been breathed of its conformity to the constitution.

In our judgment, the construction contended for proceeds upon too narrow a view of the language of the constitution. The power given to Congress is not merely "to define and punish piracy;" if it were, the words "to define" would seem almost superfluous, since the power to punish piracies would be held to include the power of ascertaining and fixing the definition of the crime. And it has been very justly observed, in a celebrated commentary, that the definition of piracies might have been left without inconvenience to the law of nations, though a legislative definition of them is to be found in most municipal codes.<sup>1</sup> But [*159] the power is also given "to define and punish felonies on the high seas, and offenses against the law of nations." The term "felonies" has been supposed, in the same work, not to have a very exact and determinate meaning in relation to offenses at the common law committed within the body of a county. However this may be, in relation to offenses on the high seas, it is necessarily somewhat indeterminate, since the term is not used in the criminal jurisprudence of the admiralty in the technical sense of the common law.<sup>2</sup> Offenses, too, against the law of nations, cannot, with any accuracy, be said to be completely ascertained and defined in any public code recognized by the common consent of nations. In respect, therefore, as well to felonies on the high seas as to offenses against the law of nations, there is a peculiar fitness in giving the power to define as well as to punish; and there is not the slightest reason to doubt that this consideration had very great weight in producing the phraseology in question.

But supposing Congress were bound in all the cases included in the clause under consideration to define the offense, still there is nothing which restricts it to a mere logical enumeration in detail of all the facts constituting the offense. Congress may as well define by using a term of a known and determinate meaning as by an express enumeration of all the particulars included in that term. That is certain which is by necessary reference [*160] made certain. When the act of 1790 declares, that any person who shall commit the crime of robbery, or murder, on the high seas, shall be deemed a pirate, the crime is not less clearly ascertained than it would be by using the definitions of these terms as they are found in our treatises of the common law. In fact, by such a reference, the definitions are necessarily included, as much as if they stood in the text of the act. In respect to murder, where "malice aforethought" is of the essence of the offense, even if the common law definition were quoted in express terms, we should still be driven to deny that the definition was perfect, since the meaning of "malice aforethought" would remain to be gathered from the common law. There would then be no end to our difficulties, or our definitions, for each would involve some terms which might still require some new explanation. Such a construction of the constitution is, therefore, wholly inadmissible. To define piracies, in the sense of the constitution, is merely to enumerate the crimes which shall constitute piracy; and this may be done either by a reference to crimes having a technical name, and determinate extent, or by enumerating the acts in detail, upon which the punishment is inflicted.

It is next to be considered, whether the crime of piracy is defined by the law of nations with reasonable certainty. What the law of nations on this subject is, may be ascertained by consulting the works of jurists, writing professedly on public law; or by the general usage 161*and practice of nations; or by judicial *decisions recognizing and enforcing that law. There is scarcely a writer on the law of nations who does not allude to piracy as a crime of a settled and determinate nature; and whatever may be the diversity of definitions, in other respects, all writers concur in holding that robbery, or forcible depredations upon the sea, animo furandi, is piracy. The same doctrine is held by all the great writers on maritime law, in terms that admit of no reasonable doubt.<sup>1</sup> The common law, too, recognizes and punishes piracy as an offense, not against its own municipal code, but as an offense against the law of nations (which is part of the common law), as an offense against the universal law of society, a pirate being deemed an enemy of the human race. Indeed, until the statute of 28th of Henry VIII., ch. 15, piracy was punishable in England only in the admiralty as a civil law offense; and that statute, in changing the jurisdiction, has been universally admitted not to have changed the nature of the offense.<sup>2</sup> Sir Charles Hedges, in his charge at the admiralty sessions, in the case of Rex v. Dawson (5 State Trials), declared in emphatic 162*terms, that "piracy is *only a sea term for robbery, piracy being a robbery committed within the jurisdiction of the admiralty." Sir Leoline Jenkins, too, on a like occasion, declared that "a robbery, when committed upon the sea, is what we call piracy;" and he cited the civil law writers, in proof. And it is manifest from the language of Sir William Blackstone,<sup>3</sup> in his comments on piracy, that he considered the common law definition as distinguishable in no essential respect from that of the law of nations. So that, whether we advert to writers on the common law, or the maritime law, or the law of nations, we shall find that they universally treat of piracy as an offense against the law of nations, and that its true definition by that law is robbery upon the sea. And the general practice of all nations in punishing all persons, whether natives or foreigners, who have committed this offense against any persons whatsoever, with whom they are in amity, is a conclusive proof that the offense is supposed to depend, not upon the particular provisions of any municipal code, but upon the law of nations, both for its definition and punishment. We have, therefore, no hesitation in declaring that piracy, by the law of nations, is robbery upon the sea, and that it is sufficiently and constitutionally defined by the fifth section of the act of 1819.

Another point has been made in this case, which is, that the special verdict does not contain sufficient facts upon which the court can pronounce that the *prisoner is guilty of [163 piracy. We are of a different opinion. The special verdict finds that the prisoner is guilty of the plunder and robbery charged in the indictment; and finds certain additional facts from which it is most manifest that he and his associates were, at the time of committing the offense, freebooters upon the sea, not under the acknowledged authority, or deriving protection from the flag or commission of any government. If, under such circumstances, the offense be not piracy, it is difficult to conceive any which would more completely fit the definition.

It is to be certified to the Circuit Court, that upon the facts stated, the case is piracy, as defined by the law of nations, so as to be punishable under the act of Congress of the 3d of March. 1819.<sup>4</sup>

Grotius (lib. 3, c. 3, s. 1.) says: "Supra dicere incipimus justum bellum apud probos auctores dici saepe, non ex causa unde oritur, neque ut alias ex rerum gestarum magnitudine, sed ob peculiare quosdam juris effectus. Quale autem sit hoc bellum optime intelligitur ex hostium definitione apud Romanos jurisconsultos: Hostes sunt, qui nobis, aut quibus nos publice bellum decernimus; cæteri latrones aut prædones sunt, ait Pomponius (Dig. Lib. 50, tit. 16, l. 118), nec aliter Ulpianus, (Dig. lib. 49, tit. 15, l. 24), hostes sunt, quibus bellum publice populus Romanus decrevit, vel ipsi populo Romano; cæteri latrunculi vel prædones appellantur. Et ideo, qui a latronibus captus est servus latronum non est, nec postliminium illi, necessarium est. Ab hostibus autem captus; puta a Germanis et Parthis et servus est hostium, et postliminio statum pristinum recuperat. Et Paulus (Dig. lib. 49, tit. 15, l. 19, s. 2). A piratis aut latronibus capti liberi permanent. Accedat illud Ulpiani; in civilibus dissentionibus quamvis sæpe per eas res publica lædatur, non tamen in exitium reipublicæ contenditur; qui in alterutras partes discedent, vice hostium non sunt eorum, inter quos jura captivitatum aut postliminiorum fuerint; et ideo captos, et venundatos, posteaque manumissos placuit supervacuo repetere a principe ingenuitatem, quam nulla captivitate amiserant. (Dig. lib. 49, tit. 15, l. 321, s. 2.)"

Grotius adds (s. 2): "Illud tantum notandum, sub exemplo populi Romani quemvis intelligi, qui in civitate summum imperium habeat."

Again, he says (s. 2), "Non autem statim res publica aut civitas esse desinit, si quid admittat injustum, etiam communiter; nec coetus piratarum aut latronum civitas est, etiamsi forte aequalitatem quandam inter se servant, sine qua nullus coetus posset consistere. Nam hi criminis causa sociantur; illi etsi interdum delicto non vacant juris tamen fruendi causa sociati sunt, et exteris jus reddunt, si non per omnia secundum jus nature, quod multos apud populos ex-parte quasi oblitteratum alibi ostendimus, certe secundum pacta cum quibus que inita, aut secundum mores."

Again, he says (s. 2): "A latronibus captos capitentium non fieri, supra dicentem audivimus Ulpianum. Idem captos a Germanis ait libertatem amittere. Atqui apud Germanos latrocinia, quæ extra civitatis ejusque fines fiebant, nullam habebant infamiam, quæ verba sunt Caesaris, etc. Idem alibi Catts nobilem Germaniæ populum latrocinia agitasse dicit. Apud eundem Garamantes latrociniiis faunda gens; sed gens tamen, Illyrici sine discrimine maris proedae agere soliti; de his tamen triumphus fuit; Pompeio de piratis non fuit. Tantum discrimen est inter populum quantumvis sceleratum et inter eos, qui, cum populus non sint, sceleris causa coeunt."

Again, he says (lib. 3, c. 9, s. 16): "Eae vexo res quæ intra presidia perductæ nondum sunt, quantum ab hostibus occupatæ, ideo postliminii non egent, quia dominum novum mutarunt, ex gentium jure. Et quæ piratæ aut latrones nobis eripuerunt non opus habent postliminis, ut Ulpianus et Javolenus responderunt; quia jus gentium illis

And (Id. s. 17), "Potest tamen lege civili aliud constitui; sicuti lege Hispanica naves a piratis capte eorum fiunt, qui eas eripiunt piratis; neque enim iniquum est, ut privata res publicæ utilitati cedat, presertim in tanta recuperandi difficultate. Sed lex talis non obstat exteris, quo minus res suas vindicent."

Again, he says (lib. 2, c. 17, s. 20): "Ex neglectu tenentur reges ac magistratus, qui ad inhibenda latrocinia et piraticam non adhibent ea quæ possunt ac debent remedia; quo nomine damuati olim ab Amphictionibus Scyrii. Dixi eos in nihil amplius teneri, quam ut noxios, si reperiri possent, punirent, aut dederent; prætere a in bona raptorum jus reddi curarent."

Again, he says (Id. c. 18, s. 2, 3): "Piratae et latrones qui civitatem non faciunt, jure gentium niti non possunt, &c. Sed interdum tales qui sunt jns legationis nanciscuntur fide data, ut olim fugitivi in saltu Pyrenæo."

Again, (lib. 3, c. 13, s. 15): "Repudiandus ergo Cicero (De Offic. lib. 3, cap. 29), cum ait perjurium nullum esse predonibus pactum pro capite pretium non adservatur, nec si juratum quidem sit; quia pirata non sit ex perduellium numero desinitus, sed communis hostis omnium, eum quo nec fides esse debeat, nec jus jurandum commune, &c. Atque sicut in jure gentium constituto differe hostem a pirata verum est, et a nobis infra ostendetur; ita hic æ differentia locum habere non potest, ubi, etsi personæ jus deficiat cum Deo negotium est; qua de causa juramentum voti nomine noncupatur. Neque id quod sumit Cicero verum est, nullum esse cum prædone juris societatem. Nam depositum ex ipso gentium jure reddendum latroni, si dominus non apparet recte Tryphonino responsum est."

These passages abundantly show the opinion of Grotius, that piracy by the law of nations is the same thing as piracy by the civil law; and though he nowhere defines the crime, in precise terms, yet there seems to be no doubt as to what he understood to be comprehended in that crime. Piratae, latrones, prædones, are used to denote the same class of offenders; the first term being generally applied to robbers or plunderers on the sea, and the others to robbers or plunderers on land.

The terms are, indeed, convertible in many instances in the civil law. Thus, in the title, De Lege Rhodia de Jactu (Dig. lib. 14, tit. 2, s. 3), it is said, "Si navis a piratis redempta sit, Servius, Osilius, Labeo, omnes conferre debere aiunt. Quod vero prædones abstulerint, cum perdere ejus fuerit, nec conferendum ei qui suas merces redemerit."

Bynkershoek (Quæst. Jur. Pnb. lib. c. 17), treating on the subject of piracy, says, "interest scire qui piratae ac latrones sunt, nam ab his capta dominum non mutant neque adeo postliminio egent. Sic docet ratio; sic auctoritas juris in l. 19, s. 2, l. 24 and l. 27, de Capt. et Postlim. rev. (Dig. lib. 49, tit. 15), et sic ex pactis quarandam gentium supra probavi. Azumí (Part 2, c. 5, s. 3) says: "A pirate is one who roves the sea in an armed vessel without any commission or passport from any prince or sovereign state, solely on his own authority, and for the purpose of seizing by force, and appropriating to himself without discrimination, every vessel he may meet. For this reason pirates have always been compared to robbers. The only difference between them is, that the sea is the theatre of action for the one, and the land for the other." Sec. 11. "Thus, as pirates are the enemies of the human race, piracy is justly regarded as a crime against the universal laws of society, and is everywhere punished with death. As they form no national body, as they have no right to arm, nor make war, and on account of their indiscriminate plunder of all vessels are considered only as public robbers, every nation has a right to pursue, and exterminate them, without any declaration of war. For these reasons it is lawful to arrest them, in order that they may undergo the punishment merited by their crimes." Sec. 12. "Pirates having no right to make conquests, cannot, therefore, acquire any lawful property in what they take; for the law of nations does not authorize them to deprive the true owner of his property, who always retains the right of reclaiming it wherever it may be found. Thus, by the principles of common law, as well as the law of nature, at whatever period, or in whatever manner, things taken by a pirate may be recovered, they return again to their former owners, who lose none of their rights by such unjust usurpation." See Azumí, part. 2, c. 5, art. 3, p. 351, 361, Mr. Johnson's translation.

Lord Bacon, in his dialogue De Bello Sacro, says: "Indubitatum semper fuit, bellum contra piratas juste geri posse per nationem quancunque, licet ab iis minime infestatum et læsam, &c., &c. Vera enim causa hujus rei hæc est, quod piratæ communes humani generis hostes sint; quos idcirco omnibus nationibus persequi incumbit, non tam propter metus proprios quam respectu fœderis inter homines sociales. Sicut enim quædam sunt fœdera inscriptis et in tractatus redacta contra hostes particulares inita; ita naturalis et tacita confœderatio inter omnes homines intercedit contra communes societatis humanæ hostes." (10 Bac. Works, 313, 314, edit. 1803.)

Martens, in his Essay on Privateers, Captures and Recaptures (c. 1, s. 1) says: "L'armateur diffère du Pirate (1), Le premier est muni d'une commission ou de lettres de marque du souverain, dont le pirate est destitué. (2.) L'armateur suppose le cas d'une guerre (ou du moins celui de représailles), le pirate pille au sein de la paix, comme au milieu de la guerre. (3.) L'armateur s'oblige d'observer les ordonnances et les instructions qui lui ont été données, et de n'attaquer qu'en conséquence de celles-ci de l'ennemi, et ceux des vaisseaux neutres qui fout un commerce illicite, le pirate pille indistinctement les vaisseaux de toutes les nations, sans observer même les loix de la guerre."

Rutherford (Inst. b. 2, c. 9, s. 9, p. 481), speaking with reference to the law of nations, says: "All wars of a nation against its external enemies are not public wars. To make a war a public one, both the contending parties must be public persons; that is, it must be a war of one nation against another, &c. Where a nation makes war upon pirates or other robbers, though these are external enemies, the war will be a mixed one; it is public on one side, because a nation or public person is one of the parties; but it is private on the other side, not such a coincidence on this subject as to render a reference to that code a desirable or 176* safe mode *of proceedings in a criminal, and especially in a capital case. If it had been 177* intended to adopt the definition *or definitions of this crime, so far as they were to be collected from the different commentators on 178* this code, with all the uncertainty and difficulty attending a research for that purpose, 179* it might as well *at once have been adopted as a standard by the constitution itself. 180* The object, therefore, of referring *its definition to Congress was, and could have been no other than, to enable that body, to select from sources it might think proper, and then to declare, and with reasonable precision to define, what act or acts should constitute this crime; and having done *so, to [181 annex to it such punishment as might be thought proper. Such a mode of proceeding would be consonant with the universal practice in this country, and with those feelings of humanity which are ever opposed to the putting in jeopardy the life of a fellow-being, unless for the contravention of a rule which has been previously prescribed, and in language so because the parties on this side are private persons, who act together occasionally, and are not united into a civil society. A band of robbers or a company of pirates may in fact be united to one another by compact, &c. But they are still, by the law of nature, only a number of unconnected individuals; and consequently, in the view of the law of nations they are not considered as a collective body or public person; for the compact by which they unite themselves is void, because the matter of it is unlawful, &c., &c. The common benefit which a band of robbers or a company of pirates propose to themselves consists in doing harm to the rest of mankind."

Woodeson (Lect. 34, vol. II, 422); treating on captures at sea, after stating that the law of nations is part of the laws of England, and that captures at sea may happen either by pirates, or by way of reprisal, or as prize of war, says: "Piracy, according to the law of nations, is incurred by depredations on or near the sea, without authority from any prince or state." He then quotes the opinion of Sir Leoline Jenkins with approbation, that it is piracy, not only when a man robs without any commission at all, but when, having a commission, he despoils those with whom he is not warranted to fight or meddle, such as are de legantia vel amicitia of the prince or state which hath given him his commission. He then adds: "But according to the judgments of our domestic tribunals, a bare assault without taking or pillaging something away does not constitute the crime, though Molloy pretends that by the law of nations it is otherwise. Yet it does not seem necessary that any person should be on board the pillaged vessel." "If these violations of property be perpetrated by any national authority, they are the commencement of a public war; if without that sanction, they are acts of piracy." He then proceeds to state several cases which had arisen in the admiralty of England, and sums up his remarks as follow: "The foregoing particulars are the more deserving of consideration, because it seems agreed that when a piratical taking is ascertained, it becomes a clear and indisputable consequence that there is no transmutation of property. No right to the spoil vests in the piratical captor; no right is derivable from them to any recaptors in prejudice of the original owners. These piratical seizures being wholly unauthorized, and highly criminal by the law of nations, is no pretense for divesting the dominion of the former proprietor. This principle, therefore, 'a piratis et latronibus capta dominium non mutant,' is the received opinion of ancient civilians and more modern writers, on general jurisprudence. The same doctrine was maintained in our courts of common law long antecedent to the great cultivation and improvements made in the science of the law of nations. And he remarks in a note, p. 427, note n: "I have looked into the indictment against Luke Ryan, tried at the admiralty sessions, March, 1782, for piracy, and who is alleged to have had a Dutch commission. He was indicted not for piracy generally by the law of nations, but for that, being a natural born subject, he piratically, &c., against the form of the statute." From the whole scope of Mr. Woodeson's observations on the subject of piracy, it is very clear that he considered piracy, as punishable by the law of the admiralty, to be no other than piracy by the law of nations. The definition of piracy, and Mr. Woodeson's comments are cited with approbation by Mr. Gwillim in his late edition of Bacon's Abridgment. 5 Bac. Abr. 310, edit. 1807, London.

Burlamaqui (Part. 2, c. 7, s. 41) says: "Lastly, as to the wars of robbers and pirates, if they do not produce the effects above mentioned (transmutation of property on capture), nor give to those pirates a right of appropriating what they have taken, it is because they are robbers and enemies of mankind, and, consequently, persons whose acts of violence are manifestly unjust, which authorizes all nations to treat them as enemies."

Thus far, the authorities cited are such as profess to treat of piracy in terms according to the law of nations, the notion of which was manifestly derived from the civil law, "on which," as Sir William Scott observes (The Maria, 1 Rob. 340), "great part of the law of nations is founded." Indeed, in the law of England, it is treated altogether as a civil law offense, and referred to that law for its definition and punishment. Piracies and depredations at sea are capital offenses by the civil law. 5 Bac. Abr. Piracy, 311; Edit. ubi supra, 3 Inst. 112; Hawk. P. C., c. 37; 2 East., P. C. 796; 4 Bl. Comm. 72. The commentaries of the common law writers on the subject of piracy will be more fully considered hereafter.

Let us now advert to the definition of the civil law and maritime writers.

In the Novels (Nov. 134, tit. 17, c. 13), it is declared: "Pro furto autem nolumus omnino quolibet membrum abscondi, aut mori; sed aliter eum castigari. Fures autem vocamus qui occulte et sine armis hujusmodi delinquant. Eos vero, qui violententer aggreuntur aut cum armis aut sine armis in domibus aut itineribus aut in mari poenis eos legalibus subdi jubemus."

Calvinus, in his Lexicon Juridicum, says: "Piratae dicuntur praedatores marini; sic dicti vel a pirata, qui prius maria infestavit, vel a Graeco περανω, id est, transeo, quod conspecta insula in illam transirent, jam praedaturi. Hinc piratica ars est, quam exercent." In the French Code des Prises (Edition of M. Dufriehe Foulaines, Paris, 1804, tom. 1, p. 6), the editor says: "Le pirate est celui qui parcourt les mers avec une bâtiment armé sans commission ou patente d'aucune état, dans la vue exclusive de s'approprier tous les navires par la force. La piraterie est un assassinat; tout puissance doit faire arreter et juger des pareils brigands, et en purger la terre." Emerigon (Assur. tom. 1, c. 12, s. 28, p. 523), says: "Les Pirates sont ceux qui courent les mers sans commission d'aucun Prince ni Etat souverain pour depredre les vaisseaux qu'ils rencontrent." "Les Ennemis sont ceux, qui autorisés par un prince, ou état souverain font la guerre dans la forme établie par le droit des gens; au lieu que les Pirates sont de simples particuliers qui depredent le premier navire qu'ils rencontrent." "Les hostilités se commettent de nation à nation; au lieu que la piraterie est un brigandage qui s'exerce sur mer par gens sans aveu, et d'une manière furtive." "Les pirates sont ennemis du genre humain." "La piraterie, ou le brigandage sur mer, est un delit contre la loi universelle des sociétés." &c. And Emerigon fortifies his opinion on this subject, by citations from the civil law, from other maritime writers, and from Blackstone's Commentaries. It is plain, therefore, that he considered piracy as defined in the civil law, the maritime law, and the common law of England, as the same crime.

Bouchard (cited in 1 Emerigon, c. 12, s. 28, p. 527): "Les pirates n'ont pas le droit des armes. Ce sont des voleurs et assassins, qui ne forment pas un corps d'état. Ennemis des toutes les nations contre lesquelles ils exercent indistinctement leurs brigandages, toutes les nations sont en droit de courir sus et de les exterminer sans declaration de guerre."

M. Bonnemant, in his edition of the Chevalier De Habreu's treatise on maritime captures (edit. 1802, Paris, part. 1, c. 1, s. 5, p. 15, note), says: "Les pi-plain and explicit as not to be misunderstood by anyone. Can this be the case, or can a crime be said to be defined, even to a common intent, when those who are desirous of information on the subject are referred to a code, without knowing with any certainty where it is to be found, and from which even those to whom it may be accessible, can with difficulty decide, in many cases, whether a particular act be piracy or not? Although it cannot be denied that some writers on the law of nations do declare what acts are deemed piratical, yet it is certain that they do not all agree; and if they did, it would seem unreasonable to impose upon that class of men, who are the most liable to commit offenses of this description, the task of looking beyond the written law of their own country for a definition of them. If in criminal cases every thing is sufficiently certain, which by reference may be rendered so, which was an argument used at bar, it is not perceived why a reference to the laws of China, or to any other foreign code, would not have answered the purpose quite as well as the one which has been resorted to. It is not certain, that on examination, the crime would not be found to be rates sont ceux dont la navigation, les actions et les entreprises ne sont autorisées ni avouées par aucune puissance, qui agissent sur la propriété publique et particulière contre le vœu de toutes les nations." And De Habreu himself (as translated by M. Bonnemant, part 2, c. 6, s. 1, p. 100, 101), says: "Selon la définition de la prise, il paroît que le droit d'armer en course n'appartient qu'à ceux qui sont ennemis autorisés, appelés, en Latin, hostes. D'où il s'ensuit que les brigande et les pirates sont exclus de ce droit; qu'ils ne peuvent prétendre aux privilèges que les loix de la guerre accorde aux ennemis, et qu'au contraire ils méritent d'être punis rigoureusement comme les malfaiteurs, et qu'on est autorisé à se saisir de tous leurs biens." "De tous les tems les pirates ont été regardés comme des voleurs publics et des perturbateurs de la paix. C'est pour cela qu'il est libre à quiconque s'en saisit de leur ôter la vie sans se rendre coupable d'injustice. La préjudice qu'ils causent à la tranquillité publique, à la liberté du commerce, et à la sûreté de la navigation, a fait que toutes les nations se sont accordées à les poursuivre et à les punir avec la plus grande rigueur."

Ferrière (Dict. du Droit. art. Pirates) says: "Pirates sont des corsaires, ecumeurs de mer, qui font des courses sur mer sans aveu ni autorité du Prince ou du Souverain."

In the Encyclopédie des Sciences, &c. (Edit. 1765, art. Pirate), it is said: "On donne ce nom (Pirate) à des bandits, qui maîtres d'une vaisseau vont sur mer attaquer les vaisseaux marchands pour les piller et les voler."

Valin (Traité des Prises, c. 3, s. 2, p. 29) says: "Or la peine des pirates ou forbans est celle du dernier supplice, suivant l'opinion commune; parceque ce sont des ennemis déclarés de la société, des violeurs de la loi publique et du droit des gens, des voleurs publics à main armée et à force ouverte."

Straccha (De Naut. Part. 3, u. 30) says: "Inter Piratam et Latronem nulla alia est differentia nisi quia Pirata depredator est in mari."

Casaregis (Disc. 64, n. 4) says: "Proprie pirata ille discitur qui sine patentibus alicujus principis ex propria tautum et privata auctoritate per mare discurret depredendi causa."

Dr. Brown (2 Civ. and Adm. Law, 461, 462) says: "Piracy is depredation without authority from any prince or state, or transgression of authority by despoiling beyond its warrant." "Unlawful depredation is of the essence of piracy."

Beaves (Lex Mercatoria art. Piracy, p. 250) says: "A pirate is a sea thief, or an enemy of human kind, also aims at enriching himself by marine robberies committed either by force, fraud, or surprise, on merchants or other traders at sea."

Molloy (b. 1, c. 4, s. 1) says: "A pirate is a sea thief, or hostis humani generis, who, for to enrich himself either by surprise or open force, sets upon merchants or others trading at sea, ever spoiling their lading, if by possibility they can get the mastery."

Marshall (Insur. c. 12, s. 11, p. 556) says: "The crime of piracy or robbery on the high seas, is an offence against the universal law of society."

It is also said in 16 Viner's Abridgment (art. Pirate and Piracy, A. p. 558), and in Cowell's Interpreter (Pirate): "A pirate is now taken for one who maintains himself by pillage and robbery at sea."

Comyns (Dig. Admiralty, E. 3) defines piracy thus: "Piracy is when a man commits robbery upon the sea;" and he cites as authority, 3 Inst. 113, and 1 Sir Leol. Jenk. 94.

Lord Coke (3 Inst. 113; Co. Litt. 391) says: "This word pirate, in Latin, pirata, from the Greek word πειρατης, which again comes from πειραν as transcendo mare, of roving upon the sea; and therefore, in English, is called a rover and robber upon the sea."

Sir Leoline Jenkins, in his charge at the admiralty sessions in 1668, says: "You are, therefore, to inquire of all pirates and sea rovers, they are in the law hostes humani generis, enemies, not of one nation, or of one sort of people only, but of all mankind. They are outlawed as I may say, by the laws of all nations; that is, out of the protection of all princes, and of all laws whatsoever. Everybody is commissioned, and is to be armed against them as rebels and traitors to subdue and root them out. That which is called robbing upon the highway, the same being done upon the water, is called piracy. Now, robbery as it is distinguished from thieving or larceny, implies not only the actual taking away of my goods, while I am, as we say, in peace, but, also, the putting me in fear by taking them by force and arms, out of my hands, or in my sight and presence. When this is done upon the sea, without a lawful commission of war or reprisals, it is downright piracy." Vol. I., p. 86.

Again, in another charge, he says (Vol. I., p. 94): "The next sort of offenses pointed at in the statute 28 Hen. VIII., eh. 15, are robberies; and a robbery, when it is committed upon the sea, is what we call piracy. A robbery, when it is committed upon the land, does imply three things: 1. That there be a violent assault. 2. That a man's goods be actually taken from his person or possession. 3. That he who is despoiled be put in fear thereby. When this is done upon the sea, when one or more persons enter on board a ship with force and arms, and those in the ship have their ship carried away by violence, or their goods taken away out of their possession, and are put in fright by the assault, this is piracy; and he that does so is a pirate or a robber within the statute."

The statute of Henry VIII. here referred to, does not contain any description of piracy. Before that statute, piracy was only cognizable by the civil law in the Admiralty Court. But the statute gave the High Commission Court (created by that statute) jurisdiction of "all treasons, felonies, robberies, murder, and confederacies committed in, or on the sea," &c. The term piracy is not found in the statute, and it is only as a robbery upon the sea that the High Commission Court has jurisdiction of piracy. Sir Leoline Jenkins, therefore, refers to the civil law definition of the offense of piracy; for it is agreed on all sides that the statute of Henry VIII. has not altered the nature of the offense. (See 1 Hawk. P. C. b. 1, e. 37.)

Targa (as I find him quoted by his Spanish translator, Gison, Reflex., c. 61; De los Corsarios o Pyratas, for the original is not before me) says: "Esta (depredacion) se comete de dos modos, o por causa de guerra declarada entre dos naciones, &c., o por modo de hurto violento como Ladrones del Mar y como hacen los robos en terra los salteadores de caminos; y esto se compuela con la autentica del Derecho Civil, (*) que distingue la pyrateria del robo," &c. Again: "A los pyratas como tambien a los salteadores de camino, enemigos comunes, opresores de la libertad y comercio, y como a violadores del derecho de las gentes, puede, qualquiera oponerse y los ministros y subditos del principe pueden perseguir los y prender los aunque sea fuera del dominio y se hayan refugiado a los estados confinantes, sin que por esso quede violada la jurisdiccion; y presas que sean, se pendran en poder de la justicia de aquel Principe en cuyo estado han more accurately defined in the code thus referred to than in any writer on the law of 182*] *nations; but the objection to the reference in both cases is the same; that it is the duty of Congress to incorporate into their own statutes a definition in terms, and not to refer the citizens of the United States for rules of conduct to the statutes or laws of any foreign country, with which it is not to be presumed that they are acquainted. Nor does it make any difference in this case that the law of nations forms part of the law of every civilized country. This may be the case to a certain extent; but as to criminal cases, and as to the offense of piracy in particular, the law of nations could not be supposed of itself to form a rule of action; and, therefore, a reference to it in this instance, must be regarded in the same light as a reference to any other foreign code. But, it is said that murder and robbery have been declared to be punishable by the laws of the United States, without any definition of what act or acts shall constitute either of these offenses. This may be; but both murder and robbery, with arson, burglary, and some other crimes, are defined by writers on the common sido cogidos." Again; "Y assi concluyo, diciendo, que deben todos guardarse en el mar de Pyratas, y en la tierra de Ladrones; y todo aquel, que en el mar, playa, puerto, o otro seno de mar, o rio navegable, roba o apresa, ya sea amigo, esto es, enemigo no declarado, y tambien los paysanos, o enemigos propriamente tales, o con patente, estandarte, o sin el, o con engano, o fuerza, siempre es pyrata."

Citations from civilians and maritime writers to the same effect might be multiplied; but they would unnecessarily swell this note. It remains only to notice the doctrines which have been held by the tribunals of Great Britain, and asserted by her common law writers on the subject of piracy.

Hawkins (P. C. b. 1, c. 37) says: "A pirate at the common law is a person who commits any of those acts of piracy, robbery and depredation upon the high seas, which, if committed upon land, would have amounted to felony there."

From the terms of this definition (if it may be so called), it might be supposed, that by piracy at the common law, something was meant peculiar to that law, and not piracy by the civil law, or the law of nations. But that was certainly not the meaning of the writer. For it is perfectly well settled that piracy is no felony at common law, being out of its jurisdiction; and before the statute of 28 Henry VIII., c. 15, it was only punishable by the civil law. That statute, however, does not (as has been already stated) alter the nature of the offense in this respect; and, therefore, a pardon of all felonies generally does not extend to it. 2 East's P. C. 796; 1 Hawk. c. 37, s. 6, 8, 10; 1 Hale, 354; 2 Hale, 18; 3 Inst. 112. And it was also determined in Rex v. Morphee (Salk. 85), that "no attainder for piracy wrought corruption of blood, for it was no offense at common law." 2 East's P. C. 796; Co. Litt. 391, a. The intention of Hawkins must have been to use the phrase "at the common law" in its most comprehensive sense; in which sense the law of nations itself is a part of the common law; since all offenses against the law of nations are punishable by the criminal jurisprudence of England.

Blackstone, in the Commentaries (4 Comm. 71, 73), evidently proceeds upon this notion. He says: "The crime of piracy, or robbery and depredation upon the high seas, is an offense against the universal law of society, a pirate being, according to Sir Edward Coke, hostis humani generis." He goes on to remark, that every community hath a right to punish it, for it is a war against all mankind. He then gives the definition of piracy by Hawkins, as the definition of the common law; and then states the several statutes made in England on the subject of piracy, concluding thus: "These are the principal cases in which the statute law of England interposes to aid and enforce the law of nations as a part of the common law, by inflicting an adequate punishment for offenses against that universal law committed by private persons."

The state trials for piracy in the reign of William III. are entitled to the great consideration, both from the eminent talents of the judges who constituted the tribunal and the universal approbation of the legal principles asserted by them. It is also worthy of remark, that in none of these indictments was there any averment that the prisoners were British subjects; and most of them were for piracies committed on foreign subjects and vessels. They were all framed as indictments at common law, or for general piracy, without reference to any British statute.

In Rex v. Dawson and others (8 William III. 1696; 5 State Trials, 1 edit. 1742), the court was composed of Sir Charles Hedges, Judge of the High Court of Admiralty (as president), Lord Chief Justice Holt, Lord Chief Justice Treby, Lord Chief Baron Ward, Wheat. 5.

Mr. Justice Rookby, Mr. Justice Turton, Mr. Justice Eyre, Mr. Baron Powis, and Doctors Lane, King, and Cook (civilians). Sir Charles Hedges delivered the charge to the grand jury, and among other things, directed them as follows: "Now, piracy is only a sea term for robbery, piracy being a robbery committed within the jurisdiction of the admiralty. If any man be assaulted within that jurisdiction, and his ship or goods violently taken away without legal authority, this is robbery and piracy. If the mariners of a ship shall violently dispossess the master, and afterwards carry away the ship itself, or any of the goods, or tackle, apparel or furniture, with a felonious intention, in any place where the Lord Admiral hath, or pretends to have, jurisdiction, this is also robbery and piracy. The intention will, in these cases, appear, by considering the end for which the fact is committed, and the end will be known, if the evidence show you what hath been done. The King of England hath not only an empire or sovereignty over the British seas for the punishment of piracy, but in concurrence with other princes and states, an undoubted jurisdiction and power in the most remote parts of the world. If any person, therefore, native or foreigner, Christian or Infidel, Turk or Pagan, with whose country we are in amity, trade or correspondence, shall be robbed or spoiled, in the narrow or other seas, whether the Mediterranean, Atlantic, or Southern, or any branches thereof, either on this or the other side of the line, it is a PIRACY, within the limits of your inquiry, and cognizable by this court." It seems impossible to doubt that Sir Charles Hedges here understood piracy to be punishable by all nations, as a crime against the law of nations, and that its true definition is the same in the civil and common law as in the law of nations, viz., robbery upon the seas; and that, as such, it was punishable by the British courts in virtue of their general concurrent jurisdiction on the seas.

In Rex v. Dawson and others, there were several indictments. 1. The first was for piracy in robbing and plundering the ship Gunswey, belonging to the Great Mogul and his subjects, in the Indian seas. 2. The second for piracy, in forcibly seizing and feloniously taking, stealing, and carrying away a merchant ship called the Charles II., belonging to certain of His Majesty's subjects unknown, on the high seas, about three leagues from the Groyne in Spain. 3. The third was for piracy on two Danish ships. 4. The fourth for piracy on a Moorish ship. Dawson pleaded guilty, and the other prisoners not guilty, and were upon trial convicted, and all sentenced to death accordingly. It appeared in evidence that the prisoners were part of the crew of the Charles the II., and rose upon her near the Groyne, and afterwards ran away with her, and committed the piracies. The Solicitor-General, in stating the case to the jury, said: "They (the prisoners) are arraigned for a very high crime, a robbery upon the seas. These are crimes against the law of nations, and worse than robbery on land." Lord Chief Justice Holt, in delivering the charge to the jury, said: "That there was a piracy committed on the ship Charles is most apparent by the evidence that hath been given; that is, a force was put upon the master, and some of the seamen on board her, who, because they would not agree to go on a piratical expedition, had liberty to depart and be set ashore, &c. &c. So that I must tell you beyond all contradiction, the force put upon the captain, and taking away this ship, called the Charles II., is piracy."

On the trial of Kidd and others for piracy, &c., in 13 of William III., 1713 (5 State Trials, edit. 1742), there were several indictments. 1. The first was against William Kidd for the murder of one W.

law, which is part of the law of every state in the Union, of which, for the most obvious reasons, no one is allowed to allege his ignorance in excuse for any crime he may commit. Nor is there any hardship in this, for the great body of the community have it in their power to become acquainted with the criminal code under which they live; not so when acts which constitute a crime are to be collected from a variety of writers, either in different languages or under the disadvantage of translations, and from a code with whose provisions even professional 183* men are not always acquainted. By the same clause of the constitution, Congress have power to punish offenses against the law of nations, and yet it would hardly be deemed a fair and legitimate execution of this authority to declare that all offenses against the law of nations, without defining any one of them, should be punished with death. Such mode of legislation is but badly calculated to furnish that precise and accurate information in criminal cases, which it is the duty, and ought to be the object, of every legislature to impart.

Upon the whole, my opinion is, that there is not to be found in the act that definition of piracy which the constitution requires, and that, therefore, judgment on the special verdict ought to be rendered for the prisoner.

CERTIFICATE.—This cause came on to be heard on the transcript of the record of the Circuit Court of the United States for the district of Virginia, and on the question on which the judges of that court were divided in opinion, and was argued by counsel. On consideration whereof, this court is of opinion that the offense charged in the indictment in this case, and found by the jury to have been committed by the prisoner, amounts to the crime of piracy, as defined by the law of nations, so as to be punishable under the act of Congress, entitled, "an act to protect the commerce of the United States, and punish the crime of piracy." All which is ordered to be certified to the Circuit Court for the district of Virginia.<sup>1</sup>

Moore, on the high seas, near the coast of Malabar, in a vessel called the Adventure Galley, of which Kidd was commander. 2. The second was against all the prisoners for piracy in seizing and running away with a certain merchant ship called the Quedash Merchant, then being a ship of certain persons to the jurors unknown (not stated to be British subjects), upon the high seas about ten leagues from Cutshwen in the East Indies. In fact, the vessel and cargo appeared by the evidence to belong to Armenian merchants, and then on a voyage from Bengal to Surat. Lord Chief Baron Ward, in charging the jury on this indictment, said, "the crime charged upon them (the prisoners) is piracy; that is, seizing and taking this ship and the goods in it piratically and feloniously. This ship belonged to people in amity with the King of England." "If this was a capture on the high seas, and these were the goods of persons in amity with the King, and had no FRENCH PASS, then it is a plain piracy; and if you believe the witnesses, here is the taking of the goods and ship of persons in amity, and converting them to their own use. Such a taking as this would be felony; and being at sea, it will be piracy." The prisoners were convicted and sentenced to death. There were four other indictments, three for piracy on Moorish ships, and one for piracy on a Portuguese ship; and all the prisoners were convicted and sentenced. Mr. Justice Turton, in

The 8th section of the act of the 30th of April, 1790, c. 36, for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States, is not repealed by the act of the 3d March, 1819, c. 76, to protect the commerce of the United States, and punish the crime of piracy.

In an indictment for a piratical murder, under the act of the 30th of April, 1790, c. 36, s. 8, it is not necessary that it should allege the prisoner to be a citizen of the United States, nor that the crime was committed on board a vessel belonging to citizens of the United States; but it is sufficient to charge it as committed from on board such a vessel, by a mariner sailing on board such a vessel.

A citizen of the United States, fitting out a vessel in a port of the United States, in order to cruise against a power in amity with the United States, is not protected, by a commission, from a belligerent, from punishment for any offense committed against vessels of the United States.

It is competent, in an indictment for piracy, for the jury to find, that a vessel within a marine league of the shore, at anchor, in an open roadstead, where vessels only ride under shelter of the land at a season when the course of the winds is invariable, is upon the high seas.

The words "out of the jurisdiction of any particular state," in the act of the 30th April, 1790, c. 36, s. 8, must be construed to mean out of the jurisdiction of any particular state of the Union.

The act of the 3d of March, 1819, c. 76, s. 5, furnishes a sufficient definition of piracy; and it is defined to be robbery on the seas.

*A vessel loses her national character by [*185 assuming a piratical character; and a piracy committed by a foreigner, from on board such a vessel upon any other vessel whatever, is punishable under the 8th section of the act of the 30th of April, 1790, c. 36.

charging the jury on one of these indictments, said, "pirates are called hostes humani generis, the enemies to all mankind."

The case of Rex v. Green (4 Anne, 1704; 5 State Trials, 573, edit. 1742) was a libel or indictment in the Court of Admiralty in Scotland for piracy, manifestly treated both in the libel and the arguments as a crime against the law of nations, and as such, also, against the law of Scotland.

In Erskine's Institutes of the law of Scotland, in treating of the crime of piracy, the author says, "piracy is that particular kind of robbery which is committed on the seas." Ersk. Inst. b. 4, tit. 4, s. 65. He had in the preceding section (64) declared that "robbery is truly a species of theft; for both are committed on the property of another, and with the same view of getting gain; but robbery is aggravated by the violence with which it is attended." The definition of both these crimes seems not at all different from that of the common law.

The foregoing collection of doctrines, extracted from writers on the civil law, the law of nations, the maritime law, and the common law, in the most ample manner confirms the opinion of the court in the case in the text; and it is with great diffidence submitted to the learned reader to aid his future researches in a path, which, fortunately for us, it has not been hitherto necessary to explore with minute accuracy.

On an indictment for piracy, the jury may find the national character of a vessel upon such evidence as will satisfy their minds, without the certificate of Registry, or other documentary evidence, being produced, and without proof of their having been seen on board.

On an indictment for piracy, the national character of a merchant vessel of the United States may be proved without evidence of her certificate of registry.

Each count in an indictment is a substantive charge; and if the finding of the jury conform to any one of the counts, which, in itself, will support the verdict, it is sufficient, and judgment may be given thereon.

THESE were several indictments in the Circuit Court of Georgia and South Carolina. The following are the cases as stated for the decision of this court:

THE UNITED STATES v. JOHN FURLONG, alias HOBSON.

The prisoner was indicted before the Circuit Court of Georgia, for the piratical murder of Thomas Sunley, on the act of Congress of the 30th April, 1790, c. 36. Verdict, guilty. The offense was committed on a vessel and crew, all English. The person murdered was an English subject. The piratical vessel was a vessel of the United States, and run away with by the captain and crew. The prisoner is an Irishman, and a subject of the King of Great Britain. It was moved by the prisoner's counsel that the judgment be arrested, on the following grounds, viz.:

186*] *1st. Because the indictment does not charge the prisoner as a citizen of the United States.

2d. Because the indictment does not charge the act as committed on board of an American vessel, but charges it as committed on board of a foreign vessel, or vessel of owners unknown.

3d. Because the 8th section of the act of 30th April, 1790, c. 36; is virtually repealed by the act of 3d March, 1819, c. 76, to protect the commerce of the United States, and punish the crime of piracy.

Upon which grounds, the judges being divided in opinion, at the request of the counsel for the prisoner, it was ordered, that the indictment and proceedings thereon, together with the grounds of the defendant's motion in arrest of judgment, be transcribed by the clerk of the Circuit Court, and certified by him, under the seal of the court, and sent to this court for their decision.

THE UNITED STATES v. JOHN FURLONG, alias HOBSON.

This was another indictment against the same prisoner before the same court, on the act of Congress of the 30th of April, 1790, c. 36, for the piratical murder of David May. Verdict, guilty. The same statement appears in the record, as in the case of the indictment of Furlong, for the murder of Thomas Sunley.

187*] *THE UNITED STATES v. JOHN FURLONG, alias HOBSON.

This was another indictment against the same prisoner, before the same court, on the act of the 3d of March, 1819, c. 76, for the piratical seizure of an unknown vessel. Verdict, guilty. U. S., Book 5.

dict, guilty. The offense was committed on a foreign vessel, by a foreigner, from a vessel of the United States, which had been run away with by the captain and crew. It was moved by the prisoner's counsel, that the judgment be arrested, on the ground that as the constitution of the United States gives the power to Congress to define and punish the crime of piracy, it is necessary that Congress define before it can punish, and that a reference to the law of nations is not such a definition as the constitution requires. Upon which ground, the judges being divided in opinion, upon request of counsel for prisoner, it was ordered, that the indictment and proceedings thereon, together with the ground of the defendant's motion in arrest of judgment, be transcribed by the clerk of the Circuit Court, and certified by him, under the seal of the court, and sent to this court for their decision.

THE UNITED STATES v. JOHN FURLONG, alias HOBSON.

This was another indictment against the same prisoner, before the same court, on the act of the 30th of April, 1790, c. 36, [*188 for a piratical robbery, committed on an American ship. Verdict, guilty. The offense was committed on a vessel of the United States, from a vessel of the United States, which had been run away with by the captain and crew. The prisoner is an English subject. It was moved by the prisoner's counsel that the judgment be arrested, on the ground that the 8th section of the act of 30th of April, 1790, c. 36, on which the indictment is founded, is virtually repealed by the act of the 3d of March, 1819, c. 76, entitled, "an act to protect the commerce of the United States, and punish the crime of piracy." Upon which ground, the judges being divided in opinion, upon the request of the counsel for the prisoner, it was ordered, that the indictment and proceedings thereon, together with the grounds of the defendant's motion in arrest of judgment, be transcribed by the clerk of the Circuit Court, and certified by him, under the seal of the court, and sent to this court for their decision.

THE UNITED STATES v. BENJAMIN BRAILSFORD AND JAMES GRIFFEN.

The prisoners were indicted before the Circuit Court of South Carolina, for piracy on an American ship, under the act of Congress of the 30th of April, 1790, c. 36. The court divided on the following questions:

1st. Whether an American citizen, fitting out a vessel in an American port, really to cruise against a power at peace with the United States, is protected by a commission from a belligerent from punishment *for any [*189 offense committed by him against vessels of the United States.

2d. Whether it is competent for a jury to find, that a vessel within a marine league of the shore, at anchor in an open roadstead, where vessels only ride under shelter of the land at a season when the course of the winds is invariable, is upon the high seas.

3d. Whether the words, "out of the jurisdiction," tion of any particular state," in the 8th section of the act of Congress of the 30th of April, 1790, c. 36, entitled, "an act for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States," must be construed to mean, out of the jurisdiction of any particular state of the United States.

4th. Whether the said 8th section of the said act is virtually repealed by the 5th section of the act of Congress of March 3d, 1819, c. 76.

5th. Whether the said 5th section of the said act of March 3d, 1819, c. 76, furnishes any, and what definition of the crime of piracy.

THE UNITED STATES v. DAVID BOWERS AND HENRY MATHEWS.

The prisoners were indicted before the Circuit Court of Georgia, under the act of 30th of April, 1790, c. 36, for a piratical robbery committed on an American ship. Verdict, guilty. The prisoners were part of the crew of the Louisa, privateer, who rose upon their officers in October, 1818, and putting them out of the ship, proceeded on a piratical cruise. The Louisa was commissioned by the republic of 190* Buenos Ayres, and commanded by Captain Almeida. There is no proof of her being American owned. The prisoners are American citizens, and the piracy for which they are convicted was committed on the ship Asia, bearing the American flag. The captain asserted himself and vessel to be American; and on her stern was painted "New York." The ship Asia, at the time of the robbery, was at anchor in an open roadstead, at the Island of Bonavista. The register of the ship Asia was not produced in evidence. Verdict, guilty.

The prisoner's counsel moved that the judgment be arrested on the following grounds, viz.:

1st. That it is not competent to prove the national character of an American vessel, without evidence of her register.

2d. It is not competent for the jury to find that the piracy was committed on the high seas, when the evidence ascertained the Asia, at the time she was boarded, to have been at anchor in an open roadstead, at the Island of Bonavista.

3d. That the prisoners are not punishable under the 8th section of the act of 30th of April, 1890, c. 36, entitled, "an act for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States;" the same having been virtually repealed by the act of 1819, c. 76, to protect the commerce of the United States, and to punish the crime of piracy.

4th. That there are two counts in the indictment, the first charging the offense to have been committed on the high seas, out of the jurisdiction of any particular state; the second, 191* charging the offense to *have been committed in a certain haven, near the Island of Bonavista, out of the jurisdiction of any particular state, and that it is not competent for a jury to find a general verdict of guilty on both counts.

Upon which grounds, the judges being divided in opinion, it was ordered, that the indictment and proceedings thereon, together with the grounds of the motion in arrest of judgment, be transcribed by the clerk of the Circuit Court, and certified by him, under the seal of the court, and sent to this court for their decision.

THE UNITED STATES v. DAVID BOWERS AND HENRY MATHEWS.

The prisoners were indicted before the Circuit Court of Georgia, under the act of the 30th of April, 1790, c. 36, for a piratical robbery committed on a ship, the property of British subjects, and called the Sir Thomas Hardy, upon the high seas. The prisoners were citizens of the United States, and part of the crew of the Louisa, privateer, mentioned in the preceding case. The prisoners were found guilty, and their counsel moved that the judgment be arrested upon the following grounds, viz.:

1st. That the act of the 30th of April, 1790, c. 36, eighth section, does not extend to piracy committed by the crew of a foreign vessel on a vessel exclusively owned by persons not citizens of the United States.

2d. That the eighth section of the act of the 30th of April, 1790, c. 36, entitled, [*192 "an act for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States," has been virtually repealed by the act of the 3d of March, 1819, c. 76, entitled, "an act to protect the commerce of the United States, and to punish the crime of piracy."

Upon which grounds, the judges being divided in opinion, it was ordered, that the indictment and proceedings thereon, together with the grounds of the motion in arrest of judgment, be transcribed by the clerk of the Circuit Court, and certified by him, under the seal of the court, and sent to this court for their decision.

These causes were argued by the Attorney-General for the United States, and by Mr. Webster and Mr. Winder for the prisoners.<sup>1</sup>

Mr. Justice JOHNSON delivered the opinion of the court: A variety of questions have been referred to this court in these cases, and in the decisions to be certified to the Circuit Court, it will be necessary to notice each question in every case; but in the opinion now to be expressed, the whole may be considered in connection, as they all depend upon the construction of the same laws.

In the two cases of Smith and Klintock, it has been already adjudged, that the 8th section of the act of 1790 was not repealed by the 5th section of that of 1819, and that the decision in Palmer's case does not apply to the case of a crew, whose conduct *is such as to set at [*193 naught the idea of thus acting under allegiance to any acknowledged power. From which it follows, that when embarked on a piratical cruise, every individual becomes equally punishable under the law of 1790, whatever may be his national character, or whatever may have been that of the vessel in which he sailed, or of the vessel attacked.

This decision furnishes an answer to all those questions made in the above cases, which are founded on distinctions in the national character of the prisoner, or in that of the vessels, in relation to the piracies committed by the crew of the Louisa. The moment that ship was taken from her officers, and proceeded on a piratical cruise, the crew lost all claim to national character, and whether citizens or foreigners, became equally punishable under the act of 1790. It also furnishes an answer to all the exceptions taken in the case of piracy charged against Furlong. For whatever the court might have thought on the effect of the act of 1819, he would have been still punishable under the act of 1790. The indictment against him is general, against the form of the statute in such case made and provided, and it matters not that his offense was committed subsequent to passing the act of 1819, since the other act still remains in force, and reaches his case.

It would seem to be unnecessary to go farther in the cases against Furlong, as this conclusion decides his fate; but this court cannot foresee how far it may be necessary to the administration of justice, against accessories or otherwise, that the question in the cases of murder should also be decided.

194*] The question whether murder committed at sea on board a foreign vessel be punishable by the laws of the United States, if committed by a foreigner, upon a foreigner, is one which involves a variety of considerations, and which, in the two cases before us, is presented under an obvious distinction; on the one indictment it appears as having been committed simply on board the Anne, of Scarborough, a foreign vessel, by a foreigner upon a foreigner; on the other, as committed on board the Anne, of Scarborough, from an American vessel by a mariner of the American vessel. It is obvious that neither case comes within the express words of the decision in Palmer's case. And with regard to the case in which the American vessel is brought in view, there can exist but one difficulty.

No difference can be supposed to exist between the case of a murder committed on the seas by means of a gun discharged from a vessel, and by means of a boat's crew despatched for that purpose, as was actually the case here. And as to the right of the United States to punish all offenses committed on or from on board their own vessels, it cannot be doubted, nor has it been doubted that the act of 1790 extends to such offenses when committed on the seas. But, we have decided, that in becoming a pirate, the Mary, of Mobile, from which the prisoner committed this offense, lost her national character. Could she then be denominated an American vessel?

We are of opinion that the question is immaterial; for, whether as an American or a 195*] pirate ship, the offense committed from her was equally punishable, and the words of the act extend to her in both characters. But if it were necessary to decide the question, we should find no difficulty in maintaining, that no man shall, by crime, put off an incident to his situation which subjects him to punishment. A claim to protection may be forfeited by the loss of national character, where no rights are acquired, or immunity produced by that cause. The other case presents a question of more difficulty. It includes the case of a murder committed by one of a crew upon another, on board a foreign vessel on the high seas. The prisoner is a British subject, the deceased was the same, and the ship also British.

This, though not in all its circumstances the same, is in principle precisely that of The United States v. Palmer. The only difference is, that the case of Palmer supposes the prisoner and the deceased to belong to different vessels, and the certificate of the court would seem to cover the case of an American as well as a foreigner, who commits an offense on board a foreign vessel.

So far as relates to the point now under consideration, I have no objection to accede to the decision in the case of Palmer. I did not unite in the opinion of the court in that case, on this point, because I thought it was carried too far in being extended to piracy as well as murder, and to American citizens as well as foreigners. To me it appears, that the only fair deduction from the obvious want of precision in language and in thought, discoverable in the act of 1790, and insisted on in the case of Palmer, is, that in construing it we should test each *196 case by a reference to the punishing powers of the body that enacted it. The reasonable presumption is, that the legislature intended to legislate only on cases within the scope of that power; and general words made use of in that law, ought not, in my opinion, to be restricted so as to exclude any cases within their natural meaning. As far as those powers extended, it is reasonable to conclude, that Congress intended to legislate, unless their express language shall preclude that conclusion.

It is true that the 8th section declares murder as well as robbery to be piracy; but, in my view, if anything is to be inferred from this association, it is only that they meant to assert the right of punishing murder to the same extent that they possessed the right of punishing piracy; which would be carrying the construction beyond what I contend for. The contrary conclusion, viz., that they meant to limit the cases of piracy made punishable under that act, to the cases in which they might, upon principle, punish murder, is rebutted by the generality of the terms used; and it would seem that, with this object in view, they ought to have taken the contrary course, and declared piracy to be murder.

It is obvious that the penman who drafted the section under consideration acted from an indistinct view of the divisions of his subject. He has blended all crimes punishable under the admiralty jurisdiction in the general term of piracy. But there exist well-known distinctions between the crimes of piracy and murder, both as to constituents and incidents. *Robbery on the seas is con- *197 sidered as an offense within the criminal jurisdiction of all nations. It is against all, and punished by all; and there can be no doubt that the plea of autre fois acquit would be good in any civilized state, though resting on a prosecution instituted in the courts of any other civilized state. Not so with the crime of murder. It is an offense too abhorrent to the feelings of man, to have made it necessary that it also should have been brought within this universal jurisdiction. And hence, punishing it when committed within the jurisdiction, or (what is the same thing), in the vessel of another nation, has not been acknowledged as a right, much less an obligation. It is punishable under the laws of each state, and I am inclined to think that an acquittal in this case would not have been a good plea in a court of Great Britain. Testing my construction of this section, therefore, by the rule that I have assumed, I am led to the conclusion that it does not extend the punishment for murder to the case of that offense committed by a foreigner upon a foreigner in a foreign ship. But otherwise as to piracy, for that is a crime within the acknowledged reach of the punishing power of Congress. As to our own citizens, I see no reason why they should be exempted from the operation of the laws of the country, even though in foreign service. Their subjection to those laws follows them everywhere; in our own courts they are secured by the constitution from being twice put in jeopardy of life or member, and if they are also made amenable 198* to the *laws of another state, it is the result of their own act in subjecting themselves to those laws.

Nor is it any objection to this opinion, that the law declares murder to be piracy. These are things so essentially different in their nature, that not even the omnipotence of legislative power can confound or identify them. Had Congress, in this instance, declared piracy to be murder, the absurdity would have been felt and acknowledged; yet, with a view to the exercise of jurisdiction, it would have been more defensible than the reverse, for, in one case it would restrict the acknowledged scope of its legitimate powers, in the other extend it. If, by calling murder piracy, it might assert a jurisdiction over that offense committed by a foreigner in a foreign vessel, what offense might not be brought within their power by the same device? The most offensive interference with the governments of other nations might be defended on the precedent. Upon the whole, I am satisfied that Congress neither intended to punish murder in cases with which they had no right to interfere, nor leave unpunished the crime of piracy in any cases in which they might punish it; and this view of the subject appears to me to furnish the only sufficient key to the construction of the 8th section of the act of 1790.

As to piracy, since the decision that a vessel, by assuming a piratical character, is no longer included in the description of a foreign vessel, no case of difficulty can occur, unless the piracy be committed by the crew of a foreign vessel upon their own vessel, or by persons issuing 199* immediately from shore. If *such cases occur under the act of 1790, I shall respectfully solicit a revision of Palmer's case, if it be considered as including those cases. And shall do the same in the case of murder committed by an American in a foreign ship, if it ever occur; under the belief that it never could have been the intention of Congress that such an offender should find this country a secure asylum to him.

There are a few minor points presented in these cases which it is necessary to notice.

It was moved in favor of the prisoners, that the only legal testimony of the character of the ships plundered must have relation to their register, or rather, to the documentary papers which establish their national character. But this we think wholly indefensible. It is obvious that such testimony might be suppressed in various ways by the aggressors. Nor is it at all decisive of the real ownership of a vessel. Our laws recognize the possibility of the register's existing in the name of one, whilst the property is really in another person. The laws that require such documents to be on board a vessel, have relation to financial, commercial, or international objects, but are not decisive or necessary in a prosecution for this offense. Property or character is a matter in pais, and so to be established. However, it is unnecessary to examine the question farther, as we have decided that the national character of the vessels plundered was, in these cases, wholly immaterial to the crime.

It was also moved, in two of the cases of piracy, that as the offenses charged were committed on vessels *then lying at anchor [*200 near the shore of the islands of Mayo and Bonavista, in a road, and within a marine league of the shore, the prisoners could not be convicted:

1. Because the words, "out of the jurisdiction of any particular state," in the 8th section of the act of 1790, includes foreign as well as domestic states.

2. Because a vessel at anchor in a road is not a vessel on the high seas, as charged in the indictment.

On the first point, we think it obvious, that out of any particular state, must be construed to mean "out of any one of the United States." By examining the context, it will be seen that particular state is uniformly used in contradistinction to United States. For what reason, it is not easy to imagine; but it is obvious that the only piracies omitted to be punished by that act are land piracies, and piracies committed in our waters.

On the second point, we are of opinion that a vessel in an open road may well be found by a jury to be on the seas. It is historically known, that in prosecuting trade with many places, vessels lie at anchor in open situations (and especially where the trade winds blow), under the lee of the land. Such vessels are neither in a river, haven, basin or bay, and are nowhere, unless it be on the seas. Being at anchor is immaterial, for this might happen in a thousand places in the open ocean, as on the Banks of Newfoundland. Nor can it be objected that it was within the jurisdictional limits of a foreign state; *for, those [*201 limits, though neutral to war, are not neutral to crimes.

It was also moved, in the same cases, that as there were two counts in the indictment, the one charging the offenses as committed on the high seas, the other in a haven, basin or bay, a general verdict of guilty could not be sustained on account of repugnancy and inconsistency, as both facts could not be true. But, on this, it is only necessary to remark, that each count is a distinct substantive charge. Internal repugnancy in any one is a good exception, but non constat as to the whole, taken severally, but each may be for a distinct offense.

There is, finally, another question certified to this court, in one of the cases which arose under the captures made by the Louisa. It is, whether an American citizen, fitting out a vessel in an American port, really to cruise against a power at peace with the United States, is protected by a commission from a power belligerent as to the power against which he undertakes to cruise, from offenses committed by him against the United States?

It will be seen that the object of this question is to bring the whole crew of the Louisa under the immunities which it is supposed Almeida might have claimed by virtue of his commission. But, having decided that the vessel and crew had forfeited all pretensions to national or belligerent character, this question is anticipated. Yet, lest the ingenious views on this point, presented to the court by one of the gentlemen who argued it, should tempt the unwary into practices that may be fatal to them, 202*] we think it *proper to remark, that in Klintock's case it has been decided that a belligerent character may be put off, and a piratical one assumed, even under the most unquestionable commission. And if the laws of the United States declare those acts piracy in a citizen, when committed on a citizen, which would be only belligerent acts when committed on others, there can be no reason why such laws should not be enforced. For this purpose the 9th section of the act of 1790 appears to have been passed. And it would be difficult to induce this court to render null the provisions of that clause, by deciding either that one who takes a commission under a foreign power can no longer be deemed a citizen, or that all acts committed under such a commission must be adjudged belligerent, and not piratical acts.

THE UNITED STATES v. JOHN FURLONG, alias JOHN HOBSON.

CERTIFICATE.—This cause came on to be heard on the transcript of the record of the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Georgia, and on the question on which the judges of that court were divided in opinion, and was argued by counsel. On consideration whereof, this court is of opinion that the 8th section of the act of the 30th of April, 1790, on which the indictment is founded, is not repealed by the act of the 3d of March, 1819, entitled, “an act to protect the commerce of the United States, and to punish the crime of piracy.”

CERTIFICATE.—This cause came on to be heard on the transcript of the record of the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Georgia, and on the questions on which the judges of that court were divided in opinion, and was argued by counsel. On consideration whereof, this court is of opinion, as to the first and second questions stated by said Circuit Court, that it was not necessary the indictment should charge the prisoner as a citizen of the United States, nor the crime as committed on board an American vessel, inasmuch as it charges it to have been committed from on board an American vessel, by a mariner sailing on board an American vessel. And as to the third question, That the act of the 30th of April, 1790, is not virtually repealed by the act of the 3d of March, 1819, entitled, “an act to protect the commerce of the United States, and to punish the crime of piracy.”

ner sailing on board an American vessel. And as to the third question, That the act of the 30th of April, 1790, is not virtually repealed by the act of the 3d of March, 1819, entitled, “an act to protect the commerce of the United States, and to punish the crime of piracy.”

THE UNITED STATES v. GRIFFEN and BRAILSFORD.

CERTIFICATE.—This cause came on to be heard on the transcript of the record of the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of South Carolina, and on the questions on which the judges of that court were divided in opinion, and was argued by counsel. On consideration whereof, this court *is of [*204 opinion, 1. That an American citizen fitting out a vessel in an American port, really to cruise against a power at peace with the United States, is not protected by a commission from a belligerent from punishment for any offense committed by him against vessels of the United States.

2. It is competent for a jury to find that a vessel within a marine league of the shore, at anchor in an open roadstead where vessels only ride under the shelter of the land, at a season when the course of the winds is invariable, is upon the high seas.

3. That the words, out of the jurisdiction of any particular state, in the 8th section of the act of Congress of the 30th of April, 1790, entitled, “an act for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States,” must be construed to mean, out of the jurisdiction of any particular state of the United States.

4. That the 8th section of the act of the 30th of April, 1790, entitled, “an act for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States,” is not repealed by the 8th section of the act of the 3d of March, 1819, entitled, “an act to protect the commerce of the United States, and to punish the crime of piracy.”

5. That the 5th section of the act of the 3d of March, 1819, furnishes a sufficient definition of piracy, and that it is defined “robbery on the seas.”

6. That considering this question, with reference to the case stated, the 8th section of the act of 1790 comprises the case of piracy committed by a foreigner in a foreign vessel upon any vessel, so as to *make him punish- [*205 able with death, inasmuch as both vessel and crew no longer retained any pretension to national character after assuming that of a pirate.

7. That the national character of a vessel is a fact which a jury may find upon such evidence as will satisfy their minds, without production of the register, or proof of its having been on board of her.

8. That the 8th question is answered in the answer given to the fourth question.

THE UNITED STATES v. DAVID BOWERS AND HENRY MATHEWS.

CERTIFICATE.—This cause came on to be heard on the transcript of the record of the Circuit Court of the United States, for the District of Georgia, and on the questions on which the judges of that court were divided in opinion, and was argued by counsel. On consideration whereof, this court is of opinion, 1. That the act of the 30th of April, 1790, entitled, &c., section 8th, does extend to piracy committed by the crew of a foreign vessel on a vessel exclusively owned by persons not citizens of the United States, in the case of these prisoners, in which it appears that the crew assumed the character of pirates, whereby they lost all claim to national character or protection.

2. That the 8th section of the act of the 30th of April, 1790, entitled, &c., has not been repealed by the 8th section of the act of March 3, 1819, entitled, &c.

On consideration whereof, this court is of opinion, 1. That it is competent to prove the national character of an American vessel without evidence of her register.

2. That it is competent for the jury to find that the piracy was committed on the high seas, upon evidence that the Asia, at the time she was boarded, was at anchor in an open roadstead at the island of Bonavista.

STEVENSON'S HEIRS v. SULLIVANT.

Previous to the year 1775, H. S., of Virginia, cohabited with A. W., and had by her the appellants, whom he recognized as his children. In July, 1775, he made his will, which was duly proved after his decease, in which he described them as the children of himself, and of his wife A., and devised the whole of his property to them and their mother. In June, 1776, he was appointed a colonel in the Virginia line, upon the continental establishment, and died in the service, having in July, 1776, intermarried with the mother, and died leaving her pregnant with a child, who was afterwards born, and named R. S. After the death of H. S., and the birth of his posthumous son, a warrant for a tract of military lands was granted by the state of Virginia to the posthumous son, R. S., who died in 1796, in his minority, without wife or children, and without having located or disposed of the warrant. His mother also died before 1796. Held, that the children of H. S. were not entitled to the lands, as devisees under his will, under the act of Assembly; nor did the will so far operate as to render them capable of taking under the act, as being named his legal representatives in the will.

The appellants were not legitimated by the marriage of H. S. with their mother, and his recognition of them as his children, under the 19th section of the act of descents of Virginia, of 1785, which took effect on the 1st of January, 1787.

The appellants were not, as illegitimate children of H. S. and A. W., capable of inheriting from R. S. under the act of descents of Virginia.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of Ohio. This was a suit in chancery, and the case upon the facts admitted by the parties, was as follows: Previous to the year 1775, Hugh Stevenson, of Virginia, lived and cohabited with Ann Whaley, and had by her the appellants in this cause, whom he recognized *as his children. In July, 1775, he [*208 made his will, in which he described the appellants as the children of himself, and of his wife Ann, and devised the whole of his property to them, and to their mother. In July, 1776, he intermarried with the said Ann Whaley, and died the succeeding month, leaving her pregnant with a child, which was afterwards born, and was named Richard. The will was duly proved after the death of the testator. In June, 1776, the testator was appointed a colonel in the Virginia line, upon continental establishment, and died in the service. After his death, and the birth of Richard, a warrant for 6,666 and two-thirds acres of military lands was granted by the state of Virginia to the said Richard, who died in the year 1796, in his minority, without wife or children, and without having located or disposed of the above warrant. His mother also died before the year 1796. The defendant claimed the land in controversy under John Stevenson, the elder paternal uncle of Richard; and the appellants having filed their bill in the court below to recover the premises in question, the same was dismissed, and the cause was brought by appeal to this court.

Mr. Brush, for the appellants, stated, that the appellants insisted, that, as representatives of their father, Hugh, the warrant in question ought to have issued to them. All the laws of Virginia, granting military land bounties, were passed after the death of Hugh Stevenson. The act which extends the bounty to those who had died before any bounty was *pro- [*209 vided, is that under which the warrant issued. It assigns the bounty to the "legal representatives" of the person upon account of whose services it was granted. We maintain, that the term, representatives, is used purposely, not to exclude the heir, but to embrace others than the legal heir, under the then existing laws. It never could be intended to give a bounty to elder brothers and uncles, who might be in arms against the country; but to the immediate objects of the soldier's attention and care, whom, by his will, he had appointed to represent him, or to that class of relatives among whom personal property was distributed by the statute of distributions; certainly more just and liberal in its provisions than the feudal course of descents, by which real estate was cast on the eldest male relative in a collateral line. But, waving this point, the complainants maintain that they are heirs at law of Richard Stevenson. And they maintain this upon two grounds. First. By the Virginia law regulating the course of descents, passed in 1785, they were legitimated. Second. By the same law, as bastards, they were made capable of inheriting to their deceased brother, on the part of the mother.

1. The ancestor of Richard never had any interest in the subject that constitutes the estate. It is a gratuity given to his representative, who most clearly took as a purchaser, and the estate he held, upon his decease, passed to his heirs generally, without reference to the channel through which he derived it. The estate originated under the laws of Virginia. The parties resided in Virginia, until the establishment of the state of Kentucky, where Richard died. The descent was cast, either under the laws of Virginia or Kentucky; and, in this respect, they are the same. The act of 1785 provides, that "where a man, having by a woman one or more children, shall afterwards intermarry with such woman, such child or children, if recognized by him, shall thereby be legitimated." In the case of Rice v. Efford,<sup>1</sup> and in the case of Sleighs and Strider, cited by Judge Tucker, and given in a note,<sup>2</sup> it is decided, that this act includes cases of births and marriages, antecedent to its passage. This is its plain and natural interpretation. It was meant, as the judges say, "to protect and provide for the innocent offspring of indiscreet parents, who had already made all the atonement in their power for their misconduct, by putting the children, whom the father recognized as his own, on the same footing as if born in lawful wedlock." It meant to put them on the same footing, not only as it respected their father's estate, but in relation to the estates of each other, and the estates of all their kindred. In both the cases above cited, the father died after the act of 1785 took effect; and, in that point, the present case is to be distinguished from them. It would appear, from the case of Rice v. Efford, that the chancellor considered it a material point, that the recognition of the illegitimate children took place after the act of 1785 was in operation. And Judge Roane expressly says, that the interpretation adopted "applies to cases only where 211* the father has died *posterior to the passage of the act." This observation of Judge Roane may properly be termed an obiter dictum. The case before him did not require that point to be decided; and, we conceive that the dictum is demonstrably incorrect, as is also the intimation of the chancellor. The object of the act was to "protect and provide for the children," by giving them a complete capacity of inheritance. To give them this title, the law requires two facts—the marriage, and the recognition by the father. But, it is said, that although the law embraces the case of an anterior marriage, the recognition must be subsequent. Why this distinction? The grammatical construction of the sentence does not require it. The terms, "shall afterwards intermarry," are correctly referred to the birth of the children, not the date of the act. In relation to the marriage and the recognition, the statute speaks from the same time. The whole structure of the sentence necessarily connects them. The active participle, "having," in reference to the birth of the children, and the passive participle, "recognized," in relation to their acknowledgment, are the only terms which could properly be used to describe both anterior and subsequent cases with reasonable precision. Surely it would be a strange construction, by which the active participle is made to embrace both the past and future, while the passive participle, in the same sentence, is confined to future cases only! This can only be done by interpolating the word hereafter, so as to make that part of the sentence read, "such child or children, if hereafter recognized by him." The object of the statute does *not require, [212 but absolutely forbids such interpolation. It was designed, as the court say, in the case of Stones v. Keeling,<sup>3</sup> to establish the most liberal and extensive rules of succession to estates, "in favor of all, in whose favor the intestate himself, had he made a will, might have been supposed to be influenced." It operates solely upon the children, and it must have been designed to operate equally upon all in the same situation, whether the acknowledgment was made before or after the passing of the act. The dictum of Judge Roane evidently grew out of an argument suggested by himself, that the interpretation adopted by the court might be considered an invasion of private right. We see no difficulty on this ground; but if there were any, it is not remedied by applying the act to cases only where the father died posterior to its passage.

The possible interest which children have in the father's property, during his life-time, is not of that absolute character which the legislature cannot control. If it were, every change of the law of descents would be an invasion of the rights of expectants under the existing law. A descent cast by the death of an intestate cannot be disturbed by subsequent laws; but that is no reason why the legislature should not change the law, or give to individuals new capacities of inheritance. The security of existing rights remains inviolable, notwithstanding this is often done. By the death of H. Stevenson, before the act of 1785, his property passed *to his legitimate child. If, under that act, the appellants were legitimated, in 1787, they, thereby, could not prejudice the rights of Richard. Their new capacity was altogether prospective. From that day, they enjoyed a character to inherit rights which might thereafter accrue; and, in relation to those rights, we do not see what bearing the time of their father's death has upon the question. In the case of Sleighs v. Strider, W. Hall devised land to his son, R. Hall, for life; and after to his eldest son and his heirs forever; but if no male issue, to his eldest daughter and her heirs. Richard Hall had an illegitimate son born in 1776; in 1778 he married the mother, and recognized the son till his death, in 1796. He had also daughters after the marriage. It was determined that the son was legitimated by the act of 1785, and entitled under the devise from his grandfather. It would seem, from the dictum of Judge Roane, that if Richard Hall had died before the 1st of January, 1787, the grandson never could have been legitimated. Whether he could or not, the eldest daughter must have taken. But suppose that the grandson had lived until 1788, and, in the life-time of his father, had died leaving issue; would such issue, or the eldest daughter of Richard, have taken under the devise? We maintain that the issue of the deceased son would have taken; from which we infer that the time of death is immaterial. The interpretation of the Virginia courts can only be made rational and intelligible by rejecting the limitations suggested by the 214[*] Chancellor and Judge **Roane*, and applying the statute to all persons within its literal meaning, without reference to the time of the recognition, or the death of the father. By this course, the new capacity, in all, will take date from the 1st of January, 1787, and will confer rights from that day only; as in cases that have arisen since the statute, the legitimate rights of the children, born before marriage, all take date from the marriage, without any reference to the time of recognition, or the death of the father.

2. We insist that the appellants, being the bastard brothers and sisters of Richard on the part of the mother, are his heirs at law. The law of 1785 contains this provision: "Bastards also shall be capable of inheriting and transmitting inheritance, on the part of the mother, in like manner as if lawfully begotten of such mother." In adopting a rule for the interpretation of this provision, we insist, in the language of the court, in the case of Stones v. Keeling,<sup>1</sup> that "the act relates to the disposition of property only; and proceeds to show who shall be admitted to share the property of a person dying intestate, notwithstanding any former legal bar to a succession thereto; and in that light the law ought to receive the most liberal construction; it being evidently the design of the legislature to establish the most liberal and extensive rules of succession to estates, in favor of all, in whose favor the intestate himself, had he made a will, might have been supposed to be influenced." It gives to bastards a full 215[*] and complete capacity of inheritance, through the maternal line, both lineal and collateral. By nothing short of this can the terms of the law be satisfied. It is said, however, that the terms of the law are fully satisfied when it is extended to inheritance direct, between the bastard and the mother; thus excluding collateral descents between bastards altogether. This doctrine is founded upon an entirely erroneous rule of construction. It is assumed that the statute being an innovation upon the common law, must be construed strictly, and extended only so far as the letter absolutely requires. The Virginia courts, in the cases referred to, have adopted a different rule; and a rule more consonant to reason and justice, and to our free and equal principles of government. The incapacities of bastards grew out of the feudal system, and originated in the dispositions of the feudal lords to multiply escheats and forfeitures. Most undoubtedly it was the intention of the Virginia legislature to cut up the whole system, root and branch. If bastards cannot inherit from a legitimate brother, they cannot inherit from each other. Neither can they inherit from, or transmit inheritance to, uncles, grandfathers, or any collateral relative whatever. By the same rule, legitimate brothers and sisters cannot inherit from bastards or their descendants. And if this be the case, who can say that bastards are capable of inheriting "and transmitting inheritance, on the part of the mother, in like manner as if they had been lawfully begotten of such mother."

**Mr. Doddridge*, contra, stated: 1. [*216] That in examining the appellants' claim to hold the lands in question, as the legal representatives of Hugh Stevenson, under his will, he would contend, what indeed seemed to be admitted on the other side, that Richard Stevenson took by purchase from the state, and that Hugh never had an interest in the subject, legal or equitable, which he could devise, or which could pass from him in a course of descents. If this be so, it would certainly follow, that upon the death of Richard, under age and without issue, after having survived his mother, the estate passed from him to his heirs general, according to the letter of the act directing the course of descents, as the appellants' counsel contend, and without reference to the channel through which he obtained it. But we shall insist, that according to the equity of the 5th section of the act of descents, the land passed to the fraternal kindred.

One of the laws of Virginia on the subject of land bounties refers to them, as having been "promised by ordinance of Convention." This circumstance made a search for that ordinance necessary. There were three sessions of a convention held in the year 1775. By an act of the last, the convention of 1776 was regularly elected. The present controversy has had the effect of collecting the journals of both conventions. They are now, for the first time, published. A perusal of them will show that the conventions, although they provided for raising troops, never made a promise of land bounty to any description of the public forces. Indeed, until they declared the state independent, **they had asserted no claim what- [217]* ever to the crown lands, such a promise would have appeared absurd. The first mention of a land bounty will be found in the acts of the first regular general assembly at their October session in 1776, chapters 11 and 21, enacted after the death of Hugh Stevenson. The practice of giving bounties in land was followed up by the acts of October, 1778, c. 45, May, 1779, c. 6, and the manner of carrying them into grant was provided for by the acts of May, 1779, c. 18, and of October, 1779, c. 21. But these laws having omitted to provide for the heirs of those who were, or should be, lost in the service, two others were passed. By the first a promise was made to the officers and soldiers, then living, in these words: "and when any officer, soldier or sailor, shall have fallen, or died in the service, his heirs or legal representatives shall be entitled to, and receive, the same quantity of land as would have been due to such officer, soldier or sailor, respectively, had he been living."<sup>2</sup> The second is in the following words (comprehending the case of H. Stevenson): "That the legal representatives of any officer, on continental or state establishment, who may have died in the service, before the bounty in lands promised by this or any former act, shall be entitled to demand and receive the same in like manner as the officer himself might have done if living." It is observable that the latter act only respects the heir of an officer who had fallen before any 218* land bounty was promised *to any person; whereas the former is an encouragement held out to the living officer, soldier and sailor, &c. By the latter act, it is evident that the bounty conferred by it was not given to those who died before any bounty was provided; nor to the legal representatives of those, on account of whose services the same was given, as such. The bounty is directly given to the legal representative for the loss of an ancestor; and is so much as the father would have been entitled to had he lived or fallen in the service, &c. Here, if the heir took quasi heir, the debts of his ancestor might sweep the gift away. The difference between pay and bounty cannot well be overlooked. The first is a vested estate, and, as such, subject to debts and legacies. Bounties to the widow or heir are in the nature of compensation, or of gratuities for a loss, and are taken directly from the hand that gives. Hugh Stevenson had not, at the time of his death, even a promise of the bounty in question, nor of any other bounty. His services entitled him to his pay and subsistence alone.

It is difficult to comprehend what is meant by the opposite counsel, when he speaks of those "whom by his will he had appointed to represent him, or to that class of relations among whom personal property was distributed by the statute of distributions." As to the statute of distributions, it is enough to say, that then, as well as now, it no more embraced a bastard than the feudal law of descents. And as to the terms "appointed by his will to represent him," if they mean anything, they mean the 219* persons to *whom the party had devised the property in question. But could Hugh Stevenson devise the property in question? Real estate in Virginia was never devisable at the common law. In 1776 the English statute of wills was in force. Under that statute, those only who were seized could devise. The construction of that statute was the same in England and Virginia. Those lands only, which the testator had at the time of making his will, could be devised. The Virginia statute of wills empowers a party to devise such estates, real or personal, as the party hath, "or at the time of his death shall have," &c. This statute passed in 1785, and began its operation on the 1st of January, 1787. It is, then, obvious that the appellants cannot claim as devisees, neither at the common law nor under the English statute of wills; nor even under the Virginia statute of wills, if it had been then in force; because neither at the time of making his will nor at the time of his death, had the testator any interest in the premises.

2. The appellants claim as heirs at law to Richard, under the 19th and 18th sections of the act directing the cause of descents. The 19th section is in these words: "Where a man having, by a woman, one or more children; shall afterwards intermarry with such woman, such child or children, if recognized by him, shall be thereby legitimated." The issue also in marriages deemed null in law, shall, nevertheless, be legitimate. And the 18th section is in these words: "In making title by descent, it shall be no bar to a party that any ancestor 220* through *whom he derives his descent, Wheat. 5.

was, or shall have been, an alien. Bastards also shall be capable of inheriting or transmitting inheritance on the part of their mother, in like manner as if lawfully begotten of such mother."

In the construction of statutes no authority need be quoted for the following rules of interpretation: 1st. All the acts passed at any one session of a legislative body are to be taken together as one act. 2d. Consequently, the same words or phrases, as often as they occur, are to be construed to have the same meaning when that can be given them without gross violation of the sense. 3d. The acts of the same session, made in pari materia, are to be taken together as one act. The marriage act, the act of descents, the statute of wills and distributions, and the act respecting dower, were made in pari materia. Marriage is the source of all legitimate birth, and, as such, the cause of dower, of descents, and of distributions. These laws have extraordinary claims to be considered as one statute. They were compiled at the same time, by the same committee, composed of the ablest lawyers and civilians of their country; enacted at the same session of the same legislative body, in the same year (1785), and, lastly, all went into operation at the same time—on the 1st of January, 1789. They will be found to contain a complete code for the government of domestic relations, without any contradictions or discrepancies. These four statutes contain 164 sections, in almost every one of which the future verb shall occurs, and in all of which, with the exception *of the [221 7th section of the marriage act (which confirms past irregular marriages), its future operation cannot be disputed, nor never has been disputed.

With the rules of construction already stated, and this view of the four statutes, we will proceed to show that the appellants' construction of the 19th section is incorrect. And this, 1st, on principle, and 2d, on authority. First. The rules of constructions entitle us to give to the verb shall, in this section, the same meaning intended whenever it occurs in any of the statutes. If the legislature had intended to confer legitimacy on those recognized before the 1st of July, 1787, they certainly would have left us nothing for construction. They would not have been less cautious than in the preceding section had they shown themselves on a less important subject, "is or hath been an alien," &c. Again, it is the obvious policy of a just legislature that this act should operate prospectively, not retrospectively. Words which might bear both constructions ought to be expounded, according to that policy; to give a statute a retroactive effect without evident necessity, is inconsistent with this policy. To give to this act an operation upon past births and marriages, is to carry the liberality of construction far indeed. But to cause it to operate on the past recognitions of the father who is dead, before the commencement of the statute itself, would be unjustifiable. The principle of the law is, that after marriage, the father, if he pleases, may render his children legitimate. Legitimation, in this view, is the effect of the father's agreement; an effect of which he must be sensible, *to make it his act. It is [222 easy to conceive of cases in which a father, willing to soothe his wife, and make the best of his case, might be brought to say that her children, born before their marriage, were his, at a time when such acknowledgement would have no legal effect whatever; but who, with the provisions of this statute before him, would not make such an acknowledgment; an acknowledgment which would make the child his heir, and pledge him to the mother and the world to provide for it as such. To construe the act as having a retrospective effect on past recognitions, would, therefore, be against the general policy of legislation; contrary, often, to the wish of a deceased individual; and might be productive of much injury to private rights.

But, it is said that the possible interest which children have in the property of their father in his life-time is not of that absolute character which the legislature cannot control. This is admitted, and the statute of descents is an exercise of such a control. But the new rule of descents created by that act is known to the proprietor in his life-time, and if that pleases him not, the statute of wills, of the same date, is placed in his hands, and enables him to control the act of descents. Again, it is a maxim that nemo est hæres viventis. In life, the relation of father and child exists between legitimates, but not between illegitimates. The relation of ancestor and heir, presumptive or expectant, may exist while the former is still living. But the legal relation of ancestor and heir never does exist until the death of the father. The moment the eyes of the father are 223* closed in death, is *that in which this legal relation begins to exist, and from that time it becomes unalterable. So, after his decease, Hugh Stevenson became ancestor to Richard in ventre sa mere; but not the ancestor of the appellants.

To examine the 19th section upon authority. The cases of Rice et al. v. Efford et al.,<sup>1</sup> and of Stones v. Keeling, and Hughes v. Striker,<sup>2</sup> are all that bear upon the subject. The only question which seemed to create much difficulty in those cases was, whether births and marriages, before the act, were embraced by it; and the decisions are, that such births and marriages are embraced, where the children, born before wedlock, had been recognized by the father after the 1st of January, 1787. But this is said to be nothing more than an obiter dictum of Judge Roane. But we regard it as the reasoning of the court, given by the only judge who gave any reason for the decision. A decision, that marriages and births, before the act, are embraced by its provisions, because the recognition took place after the act was in force, is plainly a decision, that, but for the subsequent recognition, prior marriages and births could not be considered as within the act. These cases furnish good authority for applying the 7th section of the marriage act to marriages contracted before, but existing on the 1st of January, 1787; and for substituting the words "hath been," in the act of descents respecting aliens, for the words "shall have been." If this be correct, both those provisions will accord with the residue of the acts containing 224* them, *and with the act concerning dower, and the statute of wills and distributions. The operation of all will then be prospective.

The statute of descents shows, that wherever, in adopting the civil law, its framers meant to exceed or fall short of its provisions, they have done so in explicit terms. By the civil law, the marriage of the parents legitimated the children previously born, without the father's recognition.<sup>3</sup> This legitimation was the subject of the famous proceeding at the Parliament of Merton. The ecclesiastics there demanded that the marriage of the parent should legitimate the children; to which the barons returned their memorable answer: "Nolumus leges Angliæ mutari."<sup>4</sup> The common lawyers of England, therefore, would not agree to adopt the civil law in this particular. But the common lawyers of Virginia, who compiled the act of 1785, determined to adopt the civil law in this particular, sub modo; that the marriage of the parents should legitimate the children, provided the father should afterwards recognize them. It is contended, on the other side, that this recognition is nothing more than statutory evidence of the fact, which might be otherwise proved, and is not of itself a substantive provision. If this argument be correct, then by the common and civil law a bastard must always have been the heir of his natural father, provided the identity of that natural father could be proved. But as we know that the mother, both by *the common and civil law, was al- [225 ways a competent witness to establish the fact of the father's identity, and yet never resorted to for the purpose of making her child heir to the father, we have a right to conclude that the recognition required by the statute is something more than mere evidence of the fact.

3. The appellants claim as heirs of Richard Stevenson, under the 18th section, and in support of this claim they contend that the terms "inheriting or transmitting inheritance on the part of the mother, in like manner as if they had been lawfully begotten of such mother" confer a capacity to inherit and transmit inheritance in the ascending as well as descending line, and also from and among collaterals. Their doctrine amounts plainly to this: that by the true construction of the second member of the 18th section, bastards are made the legitimate children of their mothers, at least for the purposes of inheritance.

In expounding the statute of descents, it has been justly remarked by Judge Tucker, that the framers of it were eminent sages of the law, and complete masters of its technical terms. This being the case, it would be reasonable to look for the same technical language in all cases where the same thing was intended. When in the 19th section of the act of descents, and also in the marriage act, they remove from certain classes of bastards all the disabilities under which they labored, they employ that legal term which conveys their meaning clearly, and leaves nothing for construction. They say they shall be "legitimate," not that they shall be capable of inheriting "on the part of their mothers and fathers;" leaving *us to inquire [226 after the extent of the capacity. The law causes them to change characters. They cease to be bastards, and become the legitimate children of their father and mother. The consequences of their legitimacy follows. They have father and mother, sisters and brothers, uncles and aunts, with an universal capacity of inheriting and transmitting inheritance. The 18th section immediately preceding, if it had been intended to make bastard children the legitimate offspring of their mothers, would have followed the same language, and would have left nothing to interpretation. That section would have read thus: "In making title by descent, it shall be no bar to a party, that any ancestor through whom he derives his descent from the intestate, is, or hath been an alien or a bastard. Bastards also shall be considered in law as the legitimate children of their mother." The 19th section, like the marriage act, gives no new capacities to bastards as such. They make certain persons of that description legitimate, and the capacities of legitimacy follow of course. They inherit to both parents, not as bastards, but as their legitimate offspring.

1.—3 Henn. & Munf. 225.

4.—1 Bl. Comm. 455.

The second proposition of this argument is, that all the disabilities of bastardy are of feudal origin. With us it is of Saxon origin. The term bastard being derived from a Saxon word, importing a bad, or base, original. The disabilities of bastardy are the same under the civil as under the common law, and in all ages and 227* nations.<sup>1</sup> He has no ancestor; *no name; can inherit to nobody, and nobody to him; can have no collaterals nor other relatives except those descended from him. He can have no surname, until gained by reputation. This is the origin of new families. He is the propositus by common law. But by the civil law he can inherit his mother's estate.<sup>2</sup> She is, therefore, the propositus of the civil law. Collaterals descended from a male relative are by the civil law termed agnati; those descended from a female relative cognati.<sup>3</sup> In a note to Cooper's Justinian, which I take to be from the pen of Sir Henry Spelman, it is said that illegitimate children can have no agnati—Quia neque gentem neque familiam habent. If for this reason they can have no agnati, it follows that they can have no cognati; and this is the reason of Justinian's broad proposition, that bastards can have no collaterals;<sup>4</sup> which is our doctrine in this case.

It is admitted that the 18th section does not give legitimacy except specially for inheritance; that is, it removes that incapacity, and no other: finding and leaving them bastards. Now, there are no other disabilities except the incapacity to inherit or to hold a church dignity.<sup>5</sup> And since these dignities do not exist in the United States, if it had been the intention of the legislature to place the bastard on a footing of a lawful child of his mother, for the purposes of inheritance, and thus to admit him among collaterals in her line, it is inconceivable why 228* they should not have *said at once that bastards shall be considered in law the legitimate children of their mother. Instead of which they have used a technical term, ex-parte materna; which, in the civil law, is constantly opposed to this other term, ex linea materna. The first importing a capacity of lineal inheritance; the other, that and collateral inheritance also. Neither by the common nor civil law could she inherit to her child, even chattels; she is not mother for inheritable purposes by either code; and the 18th section has given her no inheritable blood of her child. Being incapable of inheriting herself, she cannot give inheritance to a legitimate child by the civil law; because, by one of its canons, the child can never succeed by representation or succession, where the parent could not.

So far, therefore, is the assertion, that the heritable disabilities of bastardy are of feudal origin, from being correct, that they were known and enforced from time immemorial in all nations; were known and enforced in England before the Norman sat foot there. The Ecclesiastics at Merton did not demand of the king that bastards should inherit even to their mother. They simply demanded, that by the intermarriage of their parents they should become legitimate; which was refused.

But it is contended by the appellants' counsel, that the words, "in like manner as if lawfully begotten of such mother," apply as well to collateral as lineal inheritance. But what is that which a bastard has capacity to do, "in like manner as if lawfully begotten of his mother?" The answer is in the words of *the [229] statute, "of inheriting and transmitting inheritance on the part of his mother."

But, we insist, that although Richard Stevenson, the son, took by purchase from the state, yet he took quasi heir, to hold as such to the use of his male ancestry, under the equity of the 5th section of the act of descents: "Provided, nevertheless, that where an infant shall die without issue, having title to any real estate of inheritance derived by purchase or descent from the father; neither the mother of such infant, or any issue which she may have by any person other than the father of such infant, shall succeed to, or enjoy the same, or any part thereof, if there be living any brother or sister of such infant on the part of the father, or any brother or sister of the father, or any lineal descendant of either of them." The principle of this section is, that the estate which came from a male ancestor shall return to his stock. The principle of the 6th section, immediately following it, is the same—that the estate which came from a female ancestor shall return to her stock. It is admitted that the case of Richard Stevenson is not within the letter of the 5th section; but is it not within the equity of it? The estate came not from the father by descent, or by gift; but in equity we may pursue the consideration of the grant, and have a right to inquire, whether that consideration was furnished in common, by the paternal and maternal kindred; and, therefore, ought to pass to both lines. The consideration of the grant to Richard Stevenson is his father's military service, and his death in that service. Loss is a valuable *consideration for a grant, and the grant [230] ought, in consequence, to be made to the heir of the family suffering the loss. A military bounty is in the nature of compensation for a loss, or of a gratuity for services. It is intended to supply to a family, as far as the liberality of the country can supply the place of a lost member. They are intended to avail the heir in his pecuniary concerns to the extent to which it is supposable his father's labor might have availed him had he lived. In this view, therefore, the bounty, given by law to the heir, is, in equity, a paternal estate, and should descend and pass to the paternal kindred, in exclusion of the maternal.

The Attorney-General, on the same side, contended, that the appellants were not entitled, either as legal representatives of Hugh or as heirs of Richard Stevenson.

1. The appellants were not the legal representatives of Hugh Stevenson; for legal representatives are those whom the law appoints to stand in a man's place, and such was not the case of the appellants. The law recognized no connection between them and Hugh Stevenson.

But, it is objected that the father had made them his legal representatives by his will. This admits of various answers: but one is sufficient, that the will was a nullity; it was revoked by the subsequent marriage and birth of a child.<sup>1</sup> Neither, therefore, by operation of law, nor by 231* any act of Hugh Stevenson,* does it appear that the appellants were his legal representatives.

2. Neither could they inherit as heirs to Richard Stevenson; for, being natural children, there was no common blood between them.

It is again objected that they were legitimated by the 19th section of the law of descents. But this clause has received a judicial exposition by the highest court of the state in which the law was passed, and is now the settled law of that land. In the cases of Rich v. Efford,<sup>2</sup> and Sleighs v. Strider,<sup>3</sup> the Court of Appeals of Virginia decided that the act applied to cases of prior births and marriages; but, that to give it an application, the father must have been in life after the passage of the act. In this case, the father had died more than ten years before the act took effect, and, consequently, the case at bar is not within its operation. But it is said that the Court of Appeals were right in extending the law to cases of births and marriages antecedent to the act; but they were demonstrably wrong in declaring that the act applied to cases only in which the father had died posterior to the act. To which we answer, that the precedent cannot be divided; if it is to have the authority of a precedent, it must be taken altogether; it cannot be entitled to the authority of a precedent so far as it favors the opposite side, and be open to dispute so far as it destroys their position. It has been the settled law of Virginia, since the year 1805; for it was then that Sleighs v. Strider was decided, and 232* though its correctness may have been originally doubtful, yet extreme inconvenience follows the disturbance of a rule of property which has been so long settled; and that this argument, ab inconvenienti, was of great weight in the estimation of the Court of Appeals itself, may be seen from the proposition to reconsider the decision of that court in the celebrated case of Tomlinson and Delland.<sup>4</sup> The original decision in that case, which subjected the succession to personal property, to the feudal principle, which, in relation to lands, respected the blood of the first purchaser, had been made in 1801. It having produced great excitement in the state, and being very generally disapproved, a reconsideration was most strenuously pressed in 1810, nine years only after the original decree; but a majority of the court was of the opinion that the inconvenience of overthrowing what was already considered as a settled rule of property, was too great to be encountered, even if the decision were erroneous at first. It is true, that they thought the decision called for by the stern language of the law; but from one of the judges this opinion was wrung with such manifest reluctance that it was believed he would have come to a different result had the question been res integra. Here the rule having been settled, the court will say how far it ought now to be considered as the settled law of the state.

If, however, these precedents be open to question at all, they are open throughout; and if the Court of *Appeals erred at all, it [233 was not in limiting the operation of the law to cases in which the father has died since the act took effect, but in extending it to cases of births and marriages which happened anterior to the passage of the law. This law took effect on the 1st of January, 1787. The births, the marriage, the recognition, and the death of the father, had all occurred in, and prior to August, 1776. Had the legislature of Virginia the right to pass a retrospective law? The Court of Appeals said not, in the cases of Turner v. Turner's executors,<sup>5</sup> Elliott v. Lyell,<sup>6</sup> and the Commonwealth v. Hewitt.<sup>7</sup> Even where it has been attempted to apply a new remedy to pre-existing rights, it is said the language must be irresistibly clear, or the court will not give it such retrospective operation.

Does the language of this act clearly intend to operate on pre-existing facts? On pre-existing marriages and births? We contend that it does not. In the case of the Commonwealth v. Hewitt, before cited, Judge Roane, in resisting the retroactive effect of the law, founds himself, in a great measure, on the general nature of laws, as prospective, and on the time assumed by the act itself for the commencement of its operation, from and after the passing thereof. Both considerations concur here, with this farther circumstance in favor of this law, that while it has (in the original act) the usual clause, "This act shall commence in force from and after the passing thereof," a subsequent and distinct law was passed *to suspend its operation un- [234 til the 1st of January, 1787. Again, this act commences with a general declaration, most unequivocally prospective. The first clause is: "Be it enacted by the general assembly, that henceforth, when any person having title, &c." According to settled rules of construction, therefore, the force of this expression, henceforth, runs through every subsequent clause. The 19th section under consideration ought to be read thus: "Be it enacted that, HENCEFORTH (that is, after the 1st of January, 1787), where a man, having by a woman, one or more children, shall, afterwards, intermarry with such woman, such child or children, if recognized by him, shall thereby be legitimated." Is this language so irresistibly retrospective, in relation to the date of the law, that the court is constrained to give it that construction? Is it not, on the contrary, so obviously future and prospective, that it requires subtlety and violence to wrest it to a retrospective meaning? The verbs which indicate the acts that are to produce the effect of legitimation, are in the future tense. It is insisted, therefore, that the clause has no application to any case, but to one in which all the facts of which it is to operate, shall happen after its passage; the birth of the children, the marriage, and the recognition. It is true, that in speaking of the children, the present participle is used, "having one or more children." But the present tense of this participle relates, not to the time of passing the act, but to the time of the marriage, "having," at the time of the marriage, "one or more children." This is not a new use of the present tense; grammarians tell us that 235* the present tense is occasionally *used to point at the relative time of a future action. The true reading of this part of the act is this, "where" (i. e., in all cases, hereafter, in which) "a man shall marry a woman, having by him, at the time, one or more children." Thus, the participle, although present at the time of the marriage, is future in relation to the passage of the act. This is no unusual application of this participle; if I say, "if a man shall go to Rome, and having a dagger in his hand, shall strike it to the heart of the Pope," the present participle is properly used in it; it is present in relation to the action with which it stands connected, though future in relation to the time of speaking. So the present participle here is present in reference to the act with which it clearly stands connected, the act of marriage; although future in relation to the date of the act. The sense is the same as if the legislature had said, "wherever, hereafter, a man shall have one or more children by a woman, and shall, afterwards, intermarry with her," &c. It is only by this construction which considers both the birth and marriage as future, that the word "afterwards," used in the act, acquires a grammatical sense, or, indeed, any kind of sense. To prove this, let us see what the effect will be of considering this participle, as used in the present tense, in reference to the time of passing the act. Then the sense will be, "where a man now having one or more children by a woman, shall afterwards intermarry with her:" it is clear that the word, afterwards, becomes insignificant and senseless. It adds nothing to the meaning; for if a man now having one or more children by a 236* woman, shall intermarry with *her, he must of necessity intermarry with her afterwards; for the future verb, shall intermarry, makes the act future, in relation to the passage of the act; and the adverb of time, afterwards, added to the verb, does not perform its appropriate function of adding a new quality to the verb. It is a useless clog, therefore, on the sense, because its tendency is to obscure, and not to illustrate the sense. Whereas, the construction for which we contend (by considering both facts as posterior to the act, but the marriage as being posterior to the birth), gives the word, afterwards, force and significancy; it then performs the office of arranging the order of the two future events. In this point we differ from the Court of Appeals of Virginia, and insist, that the liberality which would apply this act retrospectively, to previous births and marriages, is a liberality which looks beyond the judicial sphere, and belongs only to the legislature. What is the argument on which the Court of Appeals (and the opposite counsel, after them) ground themselves in extending this act to antecedent births and marriages? "I see no difficulty," says Judge Roane, in Rice v. Efford,<sup>1</sup> "except what arises from the words, shall afterwards intermarry, which might seem to import only marriages to be celebrated in future: that word, afterwards, however, is rather to be referred to the birth of the children than the passage of the act; and no good reason could possibly have existed with the legislature for varying the construction of a section, embracing two descriptions of cases standing on a similar foundation." The counsel for the appellants, seizing this *passage, has said, [237 the terms, "shall afterwards intermarry," are correctly referred (by the court) to the birth of the children, not to the date of the act. This is not accurate: it is not the three words, shall afterwards intermarry, that are referred by the court to the birth of the children: but the word, afterwards, alone. This, we admit, is correctly referred to the birth of the children: but the court having correctly gained this conclusion, forget the force of the future verb, "shall intermarry." We say, that the force of the future verb requires that the marriage shall be after the act. That henceforth, "where a man having by a woman one or more children, shall afterwards intermarry with such woman," irresistibly demands a marriage future to the date of the act; that the words, shall intermarry, make the marriage future in relation to the act. The word, afterwards, removes the marriage farther off, and marks its futurity in relation to another event, the birth of the children; which other event, although expressed by the present participle, is itself drawn forward into futurity by the force of the word afterwards, to which it is attached. That such an intention is utterly inconsistent with the prospective character given to the whole act, by the force of the word henceforth, and in the commencement. That the force of this word runs through the whole act; and that, used in the clause under consideration, it would render the retrospective construction of that clause absurd. In the passage cited, Judge Roane says, that no good reason could possibly have existed with the legislature for varying the construction of a *sec- [238 tion embracing two descriptions of cases, standing on a similar foundation. This might have been a good argument on the floor of the legislature, to induce them to embrace past cases; but it is no argument to prove that they have embraced them. Whether they ought to have embraced them is a very different question from whether they have actually done so. The first is purely a legislative question; the last purely a judicial question, and the only question in the case for the court.

But it is said, the appellants do not seek to give the act a retrospective effect; they say that the act, from the time it took effect, clothed the appellants with a new capacity of inheritance, not in relation to rights previously vested, but in relation to inheritances which might thereafter fall. Let it be admitted that their position is such; let it also be admitted, that the legislature had the right to clothe them with such new capacity in relation to future inheritances. But the question still remains, have they done so? is it to persons in their predicament that this new capacity of inheritance is extended? We have endeavored to show that it is not: whether the court look to the exposition of the statute by the tribunals of the state, or whether they look to the construction of the statute, per se. The Court of Appeals of Virginia, while they admit the application of this statute to antecedent births and marriages, decide that the law applies to cases only where the father has died posterior to the passage of the statute. The reasoning on which the court ground this distinction is not fully developed by them; the appellants' counsel infers their 239* reasoning, *and, as we may safely admit, contests it with success. But there is a reason for requiring that the father should continue in life after the act, which applies with equal force both to the marriage and the recognition, and corroborates the construction drawn from the language of the law, that both those facts should be posterior to the act. It is this: the statute attaches new legal consequences to the act of marrying a woman by whom the man had, previously, had children; and to the act of recognizing such children. Make the law prospective in those particulars, and the citizens for whose government it was intended, have it in their choice, by performing those acts thereafter, to incur those consequences or not. But attach those consequences to a past marriage and recognition, and you change the legal character of a past transaction by an ex post facto law. By a subsequent law you attach consequences to an act which did not belong to it when it was performed. It is precisely for this reason that ex post facto laws are prohibited; because consequences are attached to an act which did not belong to them at the time; and which, consequently, could not have entered into his consideration of the question, whether he would commit it or not. You surprise him by a new case, on which his judgment was never called to pass, and when it is too late to retract the step and avoid the new consequences.

3. The next ground taken by the claimants is, that if they were not legitimated by the 19th section of the law of descents, they were made capable of inheriting from Richard by the 18th 240* section of that law.<sup>1</sup> It is contended on the part of the appellants, that this clause opens an inter-communication of blood through the mother, to an indefinite extent lineally and collaterally. But we insist, that it only gives to the natural children the faculty of inheriting immediately from the mother, and of transmitting such inheritance to their posterity. The legislature has not said that natural children shall be considered as lawfully born of their mother for all the purposes of inheritance pointed out by the act. It has given them two capacities of inheritance only; the capacity to inherit on the part of the mother and the capacity of transmitting inheritances on the part of the mother. These capacities, it is true, they are to enjoy, in like manner "as if they had been lawfully begotten of the mother." But these words, "as if," &c., do not add to the number of their heritable capacities; they seem only to designate the extent to which they shall enjoy the two specific capacities which are expressly given them.

Do these capacities authorize them to claim the inheritance from Richard? What are they? 1st. That they shall be capable of inheriting on the part of their mother. 2d. That they shall be capable of transmitting inheritance on the part of their mother. *The last ca-[*241] pacity it is not contended has any application to the case at bar, this not being the case of an inheritance transmitted through the natural children, but one which they claim directly for themselves. If they are entitled, therefore, their title must arise under the first capacity—that of inheriting on the part of their mother. What is the meaning of this expression, on the part of their mother? The counsel on the other side contends, that it means from or through the mother; that it connects the bastard with the ancestral line of the mother, and through her, collaterally, with all who are of her blood. On the other hand, we insist, that the capacity does not go beyond an inheritance from the mother, and the transmission of that inheritance lineally and collaterally among their descendants; or, in other words, to make the mother the head of a new family. The expression "on the part of the mother," does not carry the mind beyond the mother, unless connected with words of more extensive significance, such as, ancestors on the part of the mother, or descendants on the part of the mother; and here it would be the supplemental words which would produce the effect, not the words, "on the part of the mother." But, it will perhaps be urged, that in the case of Barnitz v. Casey,<sup>2</sup> the counsel upon both sides, and the court, seem to have understood this term in the sense contended for on the other side. That case arose on a statute of Maryland, in which the force of the term is expounded to mean, *from or through. In our case, [*242] the Virginia statute furnishes an opposite inference. The expressions, "on the part of the father," and "on the part of the mother," occur in the 5th section of the law of descents. It is the only instance in which they do occur, and there they are indisputably synonymous with "of" and "from" any brother or sister of such infant on the part of the father, and vice versa. It is said that this provision places the natural children on the footing of legitimate children to all the purposes of inheritance. But, we would ask, does it enable the mother to inherit from them? Does it enable the mother's ancestors or collateral relations so to inherit? The provision is, that the natural children may inherit from the mother. But where is the provision that the mother may inherit from them, or that her relations may inherit from them? It is not to be found: the legislature did not look upwards beyond the mother. It was not their object to force her natural issue upon a family which she had dishonored and offended by bringing them into the world. That they should have connected them with her was just and proper; she could not complain. But to have connected them with a family from which she had probably been expelled on account of her infamy, and to have given them a capacity to inherit the estates of that family, would not have been quite so just or reasonable. We contend, that the legislature have not done it; but that the capacity to transmit applies only to inheritances descending from the mother, and from each other. Again, if the expression "on the part of the mother" is of the extent contended for, 243* then the capacity to inherit on the part of the mother is a power to take inheritances, from or through her, in right of her. But the inheritance claimed is not of this description; it is a direct inheritance from a mother, which, both at the common law and under the statute, is not an inheritance on the part of the mother; it does not come from, or through her; it does not come in her right. So say the court in the case of Barnitz v. Casey, before cited.<sup>1</sup> That was on the statute of Maryland; the statute of Virginia, in case there is no father, gives the estate to the mother, brothers and sisters, per capita, so that the shares taken by the brothers and sisters are cast at once from the deceased brother on them, and do not come to them, from, or through, or in right of the mother. This is the inheritance which the appellants claim, and which they claim in virtue of their specific and single capacity to inherit on the part of the mother.

1.—Which provides, that "in making title by descent, it shall be no bar to a party that any ancestor through whom he derives his descent from the intestate is, or hath been an alien. Bastards also shall be capable of inheriting or of transmitting inheritance on the part of their mother, in like manner as if they had been lawfully begotten of such mother."

Mr. Hammond for the appellants, in reply, stated, that the argument on the other side involved the general construction of the act, as well as its operation upon this particular case. It asserts, that the recognition must, in all cases, be subsequent to the marriage; thus proving the consent of the father to the legitimation. Now, if the legitimation does not result from the agreement, or depend upon the assent of the father, this argument is of no avail. The principle is adopted from the civil law. And it is reasonable to suppose, that 244* when the ablest lawyers and civilians of the country introduced it into their code, they intended to adopt it as interpreted and understood in the countries where it prevailed. The civilians held, that "this legitimation is a privilege or incident inseparably annexed to the marriage, so that, though both the children and parents should waive it, the children would, nevertheless, be legitimate." The foundation of this doctrine is thus explained: "Ratio est quia matrimonium subsequens ex fictione legis retrahitur ad tempus susceptionis liberorum ut legitimated habentur legitime suscepti (i. e.) post contractum."<sup>2</sup>

1.—7 Cranch, 476.

2.—Hargr. note Co. Litt., fol. 244, b. 245, a. Wheat, 5.

If legitimaey is an incident inseparably annexed to the marriage, it must be the marriage, and not the agreement of the father, that legitimates the child. But there can be no such legitimaey without the agreement or recognition of the father. Agreement and recognition are not synonymous terms. Recognition implies no more than a simple admission of a fact; it is in the nature of evidence. Agreement supposes an assent or compact, from which certain consequences result, made with a view to those consequences. Recognition refers to something past. Agreement implies a transaction from which some effect is to follow. The provision under consideration consists of an enumeration of facts, and a declaration of legal consequences resulting from those facts. The facts are, having children by a woman, and afterwards marrying her. Upon such a case the statute operates, and declares the children legitimate. But the effect follows only *the legal [245 proof of the facts; and this the statute has defined. There must be a recognition by the father; and this is considered a third fact. Though as a fact it must exist, yet its existence is only necessary to establish the first fact—that the husband of the mother is, in verity, the father of the child. No legal consequences can result, until facts are established by proof. We insist that the terms "if recognized by him" are inserted for the single purpose of defining the proof upon which the material facts should be established, and are to be regarded only as prescribing a rule of evidence for the particular case. Had the legislature intended this recognition as one fact, a principal condition upon which the legitimaey was to be founded, they could easily have connected it with the other facts, so as to have left no doubt about it. The act would have read thus: "Where a man, having by a woman one or more children, shall afterwards intermarry with such woman, and recognize such child or children, they shall thereby be legitimated." As the words now stand in the sentence, they are of very different import. The two principal facts are first enumerated; then proceeding to declare the result, the mode of proof is set down, as it were, in a parenthesis, hypothetically, and indefinite as to time. As much as to say, "when the father and mother intermarry, if, suppose that, allow that the father recognized the children, they shall be legitimate." If the recognition of the father is a principal fact; if the legitimaey is the consequence of that recognition, the child could only be legitimate from the time of the recognition. This would introduce *endless confusion [246 and litigation. The rights of parties would always depend upon the time the father signified his assent, or declared his agreement. This never was the doctrine of the civil law. Some referred the legitimation to the birth, others to the time of marriage; but all dated it from the one or the other of these periods. But as legitimation could not exist until the celebration of the marriage, we hold that it must commence at that time, and from that time confer rights upon the parties. A recognition before marriage is within the letter of the act. It supplies evidence as conclusive of the fact to be established as if made after the marriage. Constantine, who introduced this provision into the civil law, "is supposed to have intended it as an encouragement to those who had children born in concubinage, to marry the mother of such offspring."<sup>1</sup> But in our case, the recognition is in fact subsequent to the marriage. The will speaks only from the death of the testator, and is, therefore, a recognition by him at the time of his death. The appellants were born illegitimate. Their father recognized them as his children. While illegitimate, he declares their mother his wife. He afterwards marries her, and continues to recognize them as his children. He dies. Then comes an act of the legislature, the special object of which is, "to protect and provide for the innocent offspring of indiscreet parents, who had already made all the atonement in their power for their misconduct, by putting the children whom the father 247"] *recognized as his own on the same footing as if born in lawful wedlock." If birth and marriage are the facts upon which the act operates, and recognition nothing but evidence of those facts, the decisions already cited are decisive in our favor. It is settled that the act extends to cases of birth and marriage before its passage; and it is perfectly clear that the enacting part of the act is prospective. The parties upon whom it is acknowledged to operate, could claim no rights, but those which accrued after the first of January, 1787. It was at that period, and not before, that their new capacity commenced. We have shown that this interpretation of the act interferes with no vested right. And we have shown how interests in possession may be affected, upon the principle decided in the Virginia Court of Appeals. In the view we take of the case, the death of the father, before the passage of the act, is a circumstance of no importance. It is upon the children, and not upon the father, that the act operates. It attaches upon existing cases, and gives a character to transactions already past. Were he alive, he could not recall the birth, the marriage, or the recognition. A solemn disavowal of the children could not restrain the operation of the law; for we have shown that legitimation results from the facts, and not from the inclination or pleasure of the father.

The common law rules of succession, both as to real and personal estate, were exceedingly narrow and illiberal. Where those rules have been enlarged by statute, courts have always given the act a liberal interpretation in favor 248"] of the persons let in. *Thus the English statute of distributions was construed to extend to cases of intestacy that happened before its passage, where administration was granted afterwards.<sup>2</sup> No vested right was disturbed by this interpretation, though it allowed the act a retrospective operation. So in our case, though legitimated by a law subsequent to their birth, the appellants claim a new capacity, only in regard to inheritances that may fall after their legitimacy takes effect. The appellants do not seek to make themselves heirs to their father Hugh. They claim that, upon the death of their brother Richard, in 1796, they were his heirs at law. In making title by descent from a brother, the father is not noticed at the common law. The descent is held to be immediate between brothers. So, by the laws of Virginia and Kentucky, where the father and mother are both dead, the descent is cast directly to the brothers and sisters. If this position could at any time have been doubted, it is now settled by the decision of this court in the case of Barnitz's Lessee v. Casey.<sup>3</sup>

But if the appellants were not legitimated by the 19th section of the act, they claim that they are entitled, as bastards, under the 18th section. When it is admitted that the act changes the condition of bastards, the extent of that change must be ascertained. By determining the class of cases included, it can be best decided what cases are excluded. The court are called upon for the first time to put a construction upon this part of the act; and we hold, that it will not be correct to say that bastards cannot inherit *collaterally, without [249 showing that the terms and policy of the law can be fairly satisfied, and collateral inheritance between bastards denied. The court must say that the act confers nothing but a direct lineal succession between bastards and their mother; or they must say that the act removes entirely their incapacity of inheritance through and from the maternal kindred. To this last position it is objected by the counsel for the respondent, that it makes bastards the legitimate children of their mother for purposes of inheritance, which ought not to be done; because, if such had been the intention of the legislature, they would have said so in express terms. But does it follow that the capacity of inheritance would follow the express legitimation of bastards, without providing that such should be the consequence of legitimation? Children legitimated by the marriage of their parents, are no longer bastards. But bastards legitimated in the maternal line, would still, in law, be without a father, and that badge of illegitimacy must ever attach to them. It was a maxim of the civil law that the prince could legitimate bastards; but the civilians held that such legitimation did not confer the right of succession.<sup>4</sup> It was the right of succession, the capacity of inheriting and transmitting inheritance, that the legislature in this case meant to confer; and they have chosen to do it in express terms. There is no room to doubt what was intended; and we think there is no just foundation *for the exceptions and limitations [250 set up by the respondent.

We admit distinctly that the appellants must take as bastards, or they cannot take at all. They are "clothed with all the attributes and disabilities of bastards, except the capacity of inheritance, specially conferred on them, and conferred on them, too, as bastards." What were the disabilities of bastards at the time the act was passed? They could not inherit. In matters of succession and inheritance, they had no mother, and consequently could have no other relative. But except on the single subject of inheritance, the laws recognized and regarded them as standing in the same relation to their kindred as if born in wedlock. In contracting marriage, bastards were held to be relations, and prohibited from marrying within the levitical degrees. In the case of Haines v. Jeffell, the Court of King's Bench refused a prohibition to stay proceedings in the Spiritual Court against Haines for marrying the bastard daughter of his sister.<sup>1</sup> And the court said it had always been held so; especially where it was the child of a woman relative. Here the law expressly recognizes the collateral kindred between the uncle and his bastard niece. Bastards are within the marriage act, which requires the consent of parents or guardians to the marriage of persons within age.<sup>2</sup> In this case, Mr. Justice Buller declares that the rule that a bastard is nullius filius, applies only to cases of inheritance, and says it was so considered by Lord *Coke. Even Blackstone, who it quite a zealot for the common law doctrines respecting bastards, admits, almost in terms, that bastards were, at the time he wrote, subject to no disability but the incapacity of inheritance.<sup>3</sup> And Woodeson asserts the same thing.<sup>4</sup> In passing the act, the legislature meant to effect a change in the legal condition of bastards, by removing, to some extent, the only legal incapacity to which they were subject; and this was a total disqualification to inherit or transmit estates, from or to ascending or collateral kindred. It is therefore evident that the legislature contemplated conferring this capacity, in respect to the ascending or collateral kindred, or both. The civil law distinguished bastards into four classes: Those born in concubinage succeeded to the effects of their mother and relatives, and in some cases to a part of the estate of their putative father.<sup>5</sup> So that the authority of precedent is against the doctrine of the respondent, which would limit the effect of the act to inheritance direct between the mother and the bastard.

But it is urged that the appellants cannot inherit collaterally, because, legally speaking, bastards have no collateral relations, and therefore the appellants cannot be the brothers and sisters of Richard. This was true before the passage of the act. But does it remain so since? The law then provided, that so far as inheritance was concerned, a bastard was the son of no person. He had neither father nor mother, and, consequently, had no blood to convey *succession except in a lineal descent from himself. There was no blood to convey succession, either to ascendants or collaterals. Having in law no mother, there could be no source from which a bastard could derive inheritable blood, and no channel through which his blood could communicate with that of others. But as this was a provision of positive law, a new provision could restore the connection. Such is the effect of the provision under consideration. "Bastards also shall be capable of inheriting, and transmitting inheritance, on the part of their mother, in like manner as if lawfully begotten of such mother." Henceforth there shall be heritable blood between the bastard and the mother. The bastard has thus a legal mother; and having a mother, a channel is opened through which he can have brothers and sisters, and every other relative in the ascending and collateral line. It was because the bastard had no mother that he could have no brothers and sisters. The act gives him a mother. He can inherit from, and transmit inheritance to her direct. Heritable blood can flow from the mother to her bastard child, and be traced from the child to the mother, and through the mother to brothers and sisters, and uncles and aunts. The bastard is not legitimated; but his blood is made heritable through that parent about whom there can be no doubt. The character of his blood being changed, he is restored to his kindred in matters of inheritance—the only case in which the law separated him from them. It is true that the appellants were not the brothers and sisters of Richard at the time of his birth, as far as concerned inheritance. But the *act of [*253 1785 has effected a change in their condition; and from the day it took effect, they were in law, and for the purposes of succession to estates, his brothers and sisters of the half blood. Had Richard left brothers and sisters of the whole blood, the 15th section of the act would expressly embrace their case. There was no occasion to make express provision for the succession of bastards, either in the law of descents or in Judge Tucker's table, because the general provision for the half blood included their case. This is clearly the mode of succession contemplated. They shall inherit in like manner as if lawfully begotten.

It is argued that, on the part of, are technical terms of the law, which only import immediately from. The operation of the act is thus limited to a descent immediately from the mother. If we are mistaken in the consequence, which we suppose even this intercommunication of blood must work in the legal condition of a bastard, we must still inquire whether the terms of the act can be satisfied by this narrow construction. We do not admit that the terms on the part of import no more than immediately from. We insist that they are used to describe the ancestral kindred in the line of each parent. On the part of the mother, means, from or through the mother, or her relatives. Thus, brothers and sisters of the same mother, but different fathers, are brothers and sisters on the part of the mother, and are described as such in the 6th section of the act. And in the case of Barnitz's lessee v. Casey, before cited, the counsel upon both sides, and the court, seem to have understood these terms in the sense we contend for. *The capacity [*254 of transmitting inheritance, conferred by the act, can have no operation, if the terms, on the part of, be interpreted to mean, immediately from the mother. The bastard must transmit the inheritance to or through, whether it pass to ascendants or collaterals.

The common law disabilities of bastards are, like the canons of descent, of feudal origin; for it must be remembered that this disability relates entirely to inheritance. Escheats are the fruits and consequences, as Blackstone says, of feudal tenure resulting from the frequent extinction of heritable blood, according to the feudal tenure of inheritance. A bastard, being the son of nobody, could have no heritable blood; consequently, none of the blood of the first purchaser. The feudal doctrine of carrying the estate through the blood of the first purchaser, inevitably excluded inheritance among bastards. In this sense the disability of bastards was the consequence of feudal policy, and totally inconsistent with the liberal and equitable canons of descent introduced by the act of 1785. The preference of the male ascending line, preserved by the statute of 1786, is not founded upon feudal doctrines. The inheritance is directed first to the father; not because he is the most worthy of blood, but because he is the head of the family, who can best dispose of the estate among his surviving children. And upon this same principle the grandfather is preferred to the grandmothers and aunts. This is no preference of the male ancestors, but simply a preference of the husband or father, if in existence, to the wife or children of the same person; and the principle 255*] of *this doctrine is directly repugnant to that of the feudal or common law. Corruption of blood by convictions for crimes, alienage, and bastardy, were three fruitful sources of escheats at the common law. The principle of extinguishing the inheritable blood applied to each case. The first was cut up by the constitution of Virginia. The act of 1785 laid the axe to the root of the other two. Not by authorizing aliens to hold lands, or by legitimating bastards. In the one case it permits a citizen, claiming by descent, to trace his relation to an intestate through an alien. In the other it confers a capacity of inheritable blood upon bastards. The object of both provisions is the same—to enable the kindred of the intestate to obtain the property he left, instead of rapaciously seizing it for the government. The act is clearly remedial, and should be construed liberally in furtherance of the object of the legislature, conformable to the opinions of the Virginia courts already quoted.

Mr. Justice WASHINGTON delivered the opinion of the court: It is admitted by the counsel on both sides, in their argument, with which the opinion of the court coincides, that Hugh Stevenson, though the meritorious cause of the grant of this land never took any interest therein, but that the right to the same vested in his son Richard, to whom the warrants issued, as the first purchaser. It is further admitted by the counsel, that the law of descents of Ohio, at the time when Richard Stevenson died, was not more favorable to the claim of 256*] the appellants than that of *Virginia, which will be hereafter noticed; and they have, in the argument, rested the cause upon the construction of the latter law. The opinion of the court, therefore, is founded on this law.

The appellants object to the decree of the court below, upon the following grounds: 1. That the land warrants ought to have been granted to them as the representatives of Hugh Stevenson, designated as such by his last will.

2. That by the marriage of their mother with Hugh Stevenson, and his recognition of them as his children, they were legitimated, and entitled to the inheritance in this land as heirs to Richard Stevenson; if not so, then,

3. That, as bastards, they were capable of inheriting from Richard, who, they contend, was their brother, on the part of the mother.

1. The appellants' counsel do not contend that their clients are entitled to this land, as devisees under the will of Hugh Stevenson; such a claim would be clearly inadmissible, inasmuch as the testator was not only not seized of the land at the time his will was made, but the law which authorized the grant of it was not even then in existence. But they are understood by the court to insist that the will so far operates upon the subject as to name them the representatives of the testator, and to render them capable, as such, of taking under the act of assembly which passed after the death of the testator. The act provides, that where any officer, soldier, or sailor, shall have fallen, or died in the service, his heirs or legal representatives shall be entitled to, *and receive [257 the same quantity of land as would have been due to such officer, &c., had he been living.]

This claim is altogether fanciful and unfounded; for, in the first place, the appellants were not appointed by the will to be the general representatives of the testator, but the devisees, together with their mother, of all their testator's property; and 2d, if they had been so appointed, still it could not confer upon them such a description as to entitle them to take under the act of assembly, unless the act itself described them as the legal representatives of Hugh Stevenson, for whose benefit the grant was intended; and then, they would have taken exclusively under the act, by force of such legislative description, and not under, or in virtue of the description in the will. It is not likely that the expression "legal representatives," in the act, was meant to apply to devisees of deceased officers and soldiers for whom the bounty was intended, if they had lived, because, at the time this law was passed there could not be a deviser of those lands under the general law. It is more probable that they were intended to be provided for the case of a person who may have purchased the right of the officer or soldier to such bounty as the legislature might grant to him.

The next question is, whether the appellants were legitimated by the marriage of Hugh Stevenson with their mother, and his recognition of them as his children. This question arises under the 19th section of the act of 1785, directing the course of descents, which took effect on the 1st of January, 1787. This section declares, that "where a man, *hav- [258 ing by a woman one or more children, shall afterwards intermarry with such woman, such child or children, if recognized by him, shall be thereby legitimated."

There can be no doubt but that the section applied to bastards in esse, at the time the law came into operation, as well as to such as might thereafter be born. But it is contended by the counsel for the appellants, that the section is, in every other respect, prospective, not only as to the fact of legitimation, but as to the two circumstances of marriage and recognition, which entitle the bastard to the benefits of the law; and, consequently, that to bring a case within the operation of this section, both the marriage and recognition must take place after the 1st of January, 1787. On the other side, it is admitted that the privilege of legitimation is not conferred upon a bastard prior to the above period; but it is insisted, that, as to the marriage and recognition, the law should be construed as well retrospectively as prospectively.

In the case of Rice v. Efford, decided in the Court of Appeals of Virginia,<sup>1</sup> the marriage took place prior to the 1st of January, 1787, but the father recognized his illegitimate children, and died, after that period. The whole court seem to have been of opinion that the word "afterwards" referred not to a time subsequent to the 1st of January, 1787, but to the birth of the children, and, therefore, that the marriage, though prior to that period, legitimated the children before born, if they should be recognized by the father. But, it was stated by Judge Roane, in giving his opinion, that the construction of the act applies only to cases where the father has died posterior to the passage of the act.

It is contended by the counsel for the appellants, that since, in the above case, the father recognized the children subsequent to the 1st of January, 1787, this opinion of Judge Roane, as to the time of the recognition, was unnecessarily advanced, and is, therefore, entitled to no higher respect than what is due to a mere obiter dictum. Be this as it may, it is the uncontradicted opinion of a learned judge upon the construction of a law of his own state; and is noticed by this court, not upon the ground of its being considered in that state as of conclusive authority, but because it strongly fortifies the opinion which this court entertains upon the point decided; which is, that, however the construction may be as to the inception of the right, it is clearly prospective as it relates to the consummation of it. And this prospective operation being given to the act, by requiring the most important condition upon which the privilege of legitimation is to be conferred, to be performed after the law came into operation, it is less material whether the marriage was celebrated before or after that period. To render the past recognition of the father effectual to give inheritable blood to his children, who were then illegitimate, and incapable of taking the estate by descent, either from him, or from those to whom it should descend, would, in some respects at least, partake of the character of a retrospective law. It would seem to be most reasonable so to construe the law as to enable the father to perceive all the consequences of his recognition at the time he made it.

The 3d question is, are the appellants, as bastards, capable of inheriting from Richard Stevenson?

The 18th section of the law of descents, under which this question arises, is as follows: "In making title by descent, it shall be no bar to a party that any ancestor through whom he derives his descent from the intestate, is, or hath been, an alien. Bastards also shall be capable of inheriting or of transmitting inheritance on the part of their mother, in like manner as if they had been lawfully begotten of such mother."

In the construction of this section, it is never to be lost sight of, that the appellants are to be considered as bastards, liable to all the disabilities to which the common law subjects them, as such, except those from which the section itself exempts them. Though illegitimate, they may inherit and transmit inheritance, on the part of the mother, in like manner as if they had been lawfully begotten of the mother. What is the legal exposition of these expressions? We understand it to be, that they shall have a capacity to take real property by descent immediately or through their mother in the ascending line; and transmit the same to their line as descendants, in like manner as if they were legitimate. This is uniformly the meaning of the expressions, "on the part of the mother or father," when used in reference to the course of descent of real property, in the paternal or maternal line. As bastards, they were incapable of inheriting the estate of their mother notwithstanding they were the innocent offspring of her incontinence, and were, therefore, in the view of the legislature, and consonant to the feelings of nature, justly entitled to be provided for out of such property as she might leave undisposed of at her death, or which would have vested in her, as heir to any of her ancestors, had she lived to take as such. The current of inheritable blood was stopped in its passage from, and through the mother, so as to prevent the descent of the mother's property and of the property of her ancestors, either to her own illegitimate children, or to their legitimate offspring. The object of the legislature would seem to have been to remove this impediment to the transmission of inheritable blood from the bastard in the descending line, and to give him a capacity to inherit in the ascending line, and through his mother. But although her bastard children are, in these respects, quasi legitimate, they are, nevertheless, in all others bastards, and as such, they have, and can have, neither father, brothers, or sisters. They cannot, therefore, inherit from Richard Stevenson, because, in contemplation of law, he is not their brother; and even if he were their brother, they would not inherit their estate under this section, on the part of their mother, but directly from Richard, the descent from brother to brother being immediate. Upon no principle, therefore, can this section help the appellant's case. His estate never vested in the mother, so as for her bastard children to inherit from her; nor did it pass through her in the course of descent to the bastard children.

1.—The history of the respective disabilities and rights of illegitimate children in different ages and nations, is a subject of curious speculation. The most ancient people of whose laws and political institutions we have any accurate knowledge are the Jews. They appear to make little or no distinction between their legitimate and illegitimate offspring. So, also, the Greeks, in the heroic ages, seem to have regarded them as in every respect equal; but at a subsequent epoch they were stigmatized with various marks of unfavorable distinction. Among the Athenians, the offspring of parents who had contracted marriages, which, though valid by the law of nations, were contrary to the policy and the positive institutions of the state, were considered as illegitimate; and all bastards were not only deemed incapable of inheriting from either of their parents, but excluded from public honors and offices, and regarded as aliens to the commonwealth. Thus, the citizen

PERKINS ET AL. v. RAMSEY ET AL.

The following entry is invalid for want of that certainty and precision required by law: "William Perkins and William Hoy enter 6,714 acres of land on a treasury warrant, No. 10,692, to join Lawrence Thompson and James M'Millan's entry of 1,000 acres that is laid on the adjoining ridge between Spencer's creek and Hingston's fork of Licking on the east, and to run east and south for quantity." The entry referred to in the foregoing was as follows: "9th of December, 1782, Lawrence Thompson and James M'Millan, assignees of Samuel Baker, enter 1,000 acres on a treasury warrant, No. 4,222, on the dividing ridge between Hingston's fork of Licking and Spencer's creek, a west branch of said fork, to include a large pond in the centre of a square, and a white oak tree marked X, also an elm tree marked V S, near the side of the pond."

THIS cause was argued by Mr. B. Hardin for the appellants, and by Mr. Trimble for the respondents.

**Mr. Justice Todd* delivered the opin- [*270 who married a foreign woman at once degraded and denationalized his offspring.* The severity of this law was, however, occasionally mitigated from motives of policy; and when the ranks of the citizens of a Grecian republic became thinned by wars and proscriptions, they were filled up again from this disfranchised class. (Arist., Politie. l. 3, c. 3; Id., l. 6, c. 4.)

The Roman law distinguished between the offspring of that concubinage which it tolerated as an inferior species of marriage, and "the spurious brood of adultery, prostitution, and incest." (Gibbon's Decl. & Fall, &c., c. 44, s. 1.) The former were termed naturales; and the latter, spurii, adulterini, incestuosi, nefarii, or sacrilegi, according as they were respectively the fruit of prostitution, of incest between persons in the direct line of consanguinity, or related in remoter degrees, and of the violation of vows of chastity.

[263*] *None of these different classes of illegitimate offspring were stigmatized by civil degradation, or excluded from aspiring to public honors. (Œuvres de D'Aguesseau, tom. 7, pp. 384, 385; Disert. sur les Bastards.) But "according to the proud maxims of the republic, a legal marriage could only be contracted by free citizens; an honorable, at least an ingenious birth, was required for the spouse of a senator; but the blood of kings could never mingle in legitimate nuptials with the blood of a Roman; and the name of Stranger degraded Cleopatra and Berenice to live the concubines of Mark Anthony and Titus." (Gibbon, ubi supra.) "A concubine, in the strict sense of the civilians, was a woman of servile or plebeian extraction, the sole and faithful companion of a Roman citizen, who continued in a state of celibacy. Her modest station, below the honors of a wife, above the infamy of a prostitute, was acknowledged and approved by the laws." (Ib.) Thus there were several classes of persons who could not lawfully be concubines, either in respect to the infamy of their characters, ut meretrices, or in respect to their rank in life, ut ingenuæ et illustres; or in respect to their condition as married women, or nuns professed, or as within the prohibited degrees of consanguinity. (Œuvres de D'Aguesseau, ubi supra.)

Although bastards were not deprived of any civil rights by the Roman law, and "the outcasts of every family were adopted without reproach as the children of the state," yet they were excluded in the early ages of the republic from all claim to the property of their deceased parents. As the law of the XII Tables only called to the succession the agnates, or the persons connected by a line of males of the same gens or family; and absolutely disinherited the cognates or relations on the side of the mother, bastards could have no claim to the property of their parents by inheritance; not to that of the father quis neque gentem, neque familiam habent; nor to that of the mother, because her relations were entirely excluded. It seems, however, that there was no law prohibiting the father from making a provision for his illegitimate children by will, until the time of Constantine, who made some regulations restraining this liberty; which, however, are involved in such obscurity [264*] that the commentators *are not agreed as to their precise nature. J. Godefroy, in his commentary on the Theodosian code, is of the opinion that these regulations annulled such provision by will in favor of bastards wherever the testator left any legitimate children, or father, mother, brothers or sisters. (Jac. Godefroy, Com. ad Code; Theodo., l. 1; De natural. filiis.) Be this as it may, it is certain that the Emperor Valentinian, A. D. 371, permitted the bastard children of fathers, who had also legitimate offspring, to acquire either by donation or will, one-twelfth part of the paternal property; and in case the father had no legitimate children, or surviving parents, he might dispose in the same manner of one-fourth of his estate in favor of his illegitimate children. (Cod. Theodos., l. 1, De natural. liberis.) Justinian again permitted those who had both legitimate and illegitimate children to give or bequeath one-twelfth part of their property to the latter; and in case they had no legitimate children, to make the same disposition of a moiety of their estate. (Novell. 18, c. 5, Pothier Pandect. in Nov. Ordin. Redact. tom. 2, p. 55.) He afterwards permitted them, in case they had no legitimate children, nor father or mother, "quibus necessitas est legis relinquere partem propriæ substantiæ competentem," to leave the whole of their property to their illegitimate offspring; and in case their father or mother survived, the whole, except what the parents were entitled to by law. Novell. 89, c. 12. Justinian also established, for the first time in the Roman jurisprudence, the principle of giving to illegitimate children a legal claim to a portion of their father's property by inheritance ab intestato, by providing, that in case the father died intestate, leaving neither wife nor legitimate offspring, his natural children and their mother should be entitled to one-sixth part of his estate. (Œuvres de D'Aguesseau, tom. 7, 389.) This, however, must be understood strictly of the children born in concubinage, such as the Roman law recognized this domestic relation; and not of "the spurious brood of adultery, prostitution, and incest, to whom (according to Gibbon) Justinian reluctantly granted the necessary aliments of life;" but from whom it would, in fact, appear that he inhumanly withheld even this provision. "Omnis qui ex complexibus aut nefariis aut iucistis, aut damnatis proce-" [265 serit, iste neque naturalis nominatur, neque alendus est à parentibus, neque habebit quoddam ad præsentem legem participium." (Novell. 89, c. 12, s. 6.) It seems, therefore, that this provision for the necessary support of illegitimate children was confined to those termed naturales. Ib.

The stern contempt of the early Roman legislators for the female sex had entirely excluded the cognates from the rights of inheritance, "as strangers and aliens." This necessarily prevented even legitimate children from succeeding to their mother; and it is not, therefore, surprising that bastards could claim no part of the maternal estate. When the rigor of this principle was relaxed by the equitable interference of the prætor, his edict called indiscriminately to the succession both the legitimate and illegitimate children of the mother. (Œuvres de D'Aguesseau, tom. 7, p. 391; Pothier, Pandect. in Nov. Ordin. Redact. tom. 2, p. 557.) This rule was subsequently confirmed by the Tertullian and Orphitian senatus consulta, and continued the law of the empire ever afterwards, except that Justinian engrafted into it an exception unfavorable to the illegitimate children of noblewomen, mulieres illustres. Ib.

The Roman law had provided various modes by which bastards might be legitimated. 1. The first was by a subsequent marriage of the father and mother; a mode of legitimation first established by Constantine. 2. Per oblationem curiæ, a mode introduced by Theodosius and Valentinian, which was when the parent consecrated his child to the service of a city. But this only had the effect of legitimating the children in regard to their father. They had no right to inherit from collaterals, and even their claim to inherit from their father was confined to his property within the city to whose service they were devoted. 3. Adoption alone was declared by the Emperor Anastasius to be sufficient to legitimate the natural children of the person adopting them. But this law was abolished by Justin and Justinian. 4. By the last will of the father, confirmed by the emperor. But this only applied to cases where he had no surviving legitimate children, and had some sufficient reason for not having married the mother of his natural children. 5. Per rescriptum principis; by a special [266*] dispensation from the emperor granted upon the petition of the father, who had no legitimate offspring, and whose concubine was dead, or where he had sufficient reasons for not marrying her. 6. By the recognition of the father; as if the father designated one of his natural children as his child in any public or private instrument; this had the effect of legitimating the child thus acknowledged, and all his brothers and sisters by the same mother, upon a legal presumption, that a marriage might have been contracted between the parents. In all these cases, except the 2d, the children thus legitimated were in all respects placed upon the same footing as if born in lawful wedlock. (Œuvres de D'Aguesseau, tom. 7, p. 393, and seq. Pothier, Pandect. in Nov. Ord. Redact. tom. 1, p. 27.)

It should be added, that none of these modes of legitimation could apply to the offspring of criminal commerce, ex damnato coitu; since they all suppose that the children are born of a concubine with whom the father might lawfully intermarry. (Œuvres de D'Aguesseau, ubi supra.)

By the Roman law, if a bastard left legitimate children, they became his heirs precisely as if he himself had been legitimate. But if he died, without having been himself legitimated, and without children, his succession was determined by the rule of reciprocity, and his father and mother, &c., succeeded to him, precisely as he would have succeeded to them. If he had been legitimated while living, his succession was regulated in the same manner with that of persons born in lawful wedlock. (Id., p. 399.)

By the Canon law, the subject of bastardy was, in general, regulated in the same manner as by the civil law. But though bastards were capable by the latter of aspiring to all the honors and offices of the state, the former refused them the same privileges in respect to the dignities of the church. The canonists also aimed to exclude them entirely from the succession of their father or mother, but allowed all indiscriminately a right to claim the necessary aliments of life. After legitimation in any of the modes provided by the civil law, such as a subsequent marriage of the parents, &c., they regarded them in the same manner as if born in [267*] lawful wedlock. (Id. p. 400, *and seq.) It was this rule which they endeavored to impose upon the English barons at the parliament of Merton in the reign of Henry III. (1 Bl. Com. 456.)

The laws of those European countries which have adopted the Roman law as the basis of their municipal jurisprudence, regulate the rights and disabilities of illegitimate children in the same manner as they are determined by the civil and common law. But the Gothic monarchies of Europe adopted from the earliest times a legislation on this subject, in many respects different from that of imperial and papal Rome. Thus, in all the provinces of France, where the droit coutumier, or unwritten law, prevailed, bastards were incapable of inheriting ab intestato, except the property of their legitimate children, and the reciprocal right of the husband and wife to succeed to each other according to the title of the civil law, unde vir et uxor. This was the universal law of the kingdom, with the exception of the peculiar customs of a few provinces, and the pays du droit écrit, where the Roman law constituted the municipal code. (Ferrière. Dict. Mot. Bastard; Œuvres de D'Aguesseau, tom. 7, pp. 403, 430, 448.)

They were, also, with the exception of certain local customs, incapable of taking by devise from their parents, except des donations moderées pour leur aliments et entretiens. (Ferrière. Dict. ubi supra; Œuvres de D'Aguesseau, tom. 7, p. 431.)

Wheat. 5.

The king was the heir of all bastards dying without legitimate children, or without having disposed of their property by donation inter vivos, or last will and testament, in the same manner as he inherited the estates of aubains, or aliens, dying in the kingdom. 1b. Of the various modes of legitimation known to the civil law, that of France adopted only two: 1. That by a subsequent marriage of the parents; and, 2. By authority of the prince. (Œuvres de D'Aguesseau, tom. 7, p. 437.) The bastard who was legitimated by the subsequent marriage of his parents, was placed upon the same footing as if born in lawful wedlock, as to personal rights, and those of property; but he who was legitimated by authority of the prince, par lettre du prince, although capable of aspiring to civil honors and offices, was incapable of inheriting, or transmitting property *by inheritance. (Id., p. 462.) Such [268] was the law of France before the revolution; but it was greatly modified by the compilers of the new civil code, who retained but one mode of legitimation—that by a subsequent marriage and recognition of the parents. (Code Napoleon, art. 331, 332, 333.) Illegitimate children, legally recognized as such, are entitled, in case their father shall have left legitimate descendants, to one-third of the portion to which they would have been entitled had they been legitimate; in case the former shall have left no descendants, but only kindred in the ascending line, or brothers or sisters, to a moiety of the same; and in case the parents shall have left neither descendants, nor kindred in the ascending line, nor brothers or sisters, to three-fourths of the same portion. (1b., art. 757.) They have a right to the whole of their parents' property where the latter shall have left no kindred within the degrees of succession. (1b., art. 758.) Their descendants are entitled to the same rights, jure representationis. (1b., art. 759.) But bastards are not entitled in any case to succeed to the relations of their parents (1b., art. 756); and none of these provisions are applicable to bastards, the fruit of incestuous or adulterous intercourse, who are only entitled to necessary aliments. (1b., art. 762, 763, 764.) The property of bastards leaving no posterity, is inherited by the parents who shall have recognized them. (1b., art. 765.) And in case the parents are deceased, the property received from them is inherited by the legitimate brothers and sisters of the bastard; and all his other property by his illegitimate brothers and sisters, or their descendants. (1b., art. 766.)

By the law of Scotland, the king succeeds as ultimus hæres, to the estates of bastards, and they cannot dispose of their property by will, unless to their lawful issue, without letters of legitimation. But those letters do not enable the bastard to succeed to his natural father, to the exclusion of lawful heirs; for the king cannot, by any prerogative, cut off the private right of third parties. But he may, by a special clause in the letters of legitimation, renounce his right to the bastard's succession, in favor of him who would have been the bastard's heir had he been born in lawful marriage, as such renunciation does *not encroach upon the [269] rights of third parties. (Erskine's Inst. B. 3, tit. 10, s. 3.) A bastard is not only excluded, 1. From his father's succession, because the law knows no father who is not marked out by lawful marriage; and, 2. From all heritable succession, whether by the father or mother; because he cannot be pronounced lawful heir by the inquest, in terms of the brief; but, also, 3. From the movable succession of his mother; for, though the mother be known, the bastard is not her lawful child, and legitimacy is implied in all succession deferred by law. But though he cannot succeed jure sanguinis, he may succeed by destination, where he is specially called to the succession by an entail or testament. (1b., s. 4.)

The laws of England respecting illegitimate children are too well known to render any particular account of them necessary in this place. (Vide 1 Bl. Comm. 454, et seq.; Co. Litt. by Hargr. & Butler, 3 b, note 1; Id. 123, a, note 8; Id. 123, b, note 1, 2; Id. 243, b, note 2; Id. 244, a, note 1, 2; Id. 244, b, note 1.)

Hoy enter 6,714 acres of land on treasury warrant No. 10,692, to join Lawrence Thompson and James M'Millan's entry of 1,000 acres that is laid on the dividing ridge between Spencer's creek and Hingston's fork of Licking, on the east, and to run east and south for quantity."

The entry referred to in the foregoing one is in the following words, viz.: "9th of December, 1782, Lawrence Thompson and James M'Millan, assignees of Samuel Baker, enter 1,000 acres on a treasury warrant, No. 4,222, on the dividing ridge between Hingston's fork of Licking and Spencer's creek, a west branch of said fork, to include a large pond in the center of a square, and a white oak tree marked X, also, an elm tree marked V S, near the side of the pond."

On reading this last entry, the impression would be strong that the dividing ridge, Spencer's creek, and the large pond, were all to be found on the west side of Hingston's fork of 271* Licking. A subsequent *locator, or those desirous of ascertaining the land embraced by this entry, on making inquiry for the objects called for, would be informed that Spencer's creek is not a water of Hingston's fork; but is a water of Slate Creek, and lies on the east, and not on the west side of Hingston. Each of those creeks was, at the date of this entry, generally known by their respective names. There is, then, in this entry, a mistake in describing Spencer's creek as a west branch of Hingston's fork. If this mistake can be corrected according to legal principles, and well-settled rules of construing entries, it should be done, if by the correction the entry can be sustained. It is stated to be a rule of construction adopted in the courts of Kentucky, that where there are repugnant, false, or mistaken calls in an entry, they may be rejected. Admitting the correctness of this rule, the call for Spencer's creek as being a west branch of Hingston's fork, is not a repugnant, but is a mistaken one. This mistake being corrected, the entry would then read: "Lawrence Thompson and James M'Millan, assignees of Samuel Baker, enter 1,000 acres on a treasury warrant, on the dividing ridge between Hingston's fork of Licking and Spencer's creek, to include a large pond in the center of a square, and a white oak tree marked X, also, an elm tree marked V S, near the side of the pond." Those who were acquainted with Hingston's fork and Spencer's creek, would know—and the connected plat before the court shows—that there is a dividing ridge extending in a northern and southern direction between those water-courses. A subsequent 272* locator might thus have ascertained three of the objects called for in this entry—viz., the dividing ridge, Hingston's fork, and Spencer's creek; but the large pond and marked trees are still wanting to ascertain the specialty and precision of this entry. The most diligent inquiry and laborious research would not enable him to find them on, or near this dividing ridge. Here another false call or description is discovered. How is this to be corrected? It is contended that Slate Creek must be substituted for Hingston's fork, by doing which, all mistakes will be corrected, and every object called for in the entry may be easily found, and correctly ascertained. Waiving for the present all objection to this substitution, let it be examined how the entry would then stand. The description would then be "on the dividing ridge between Slate Creek and Spencer's creek, a west branch thereof, to include a large pond in the center of a square, and a white oak tree marked X; also, an elm tree marked V S, near the side of the pond." With this correction, a subsequent locator being placed at the mouth of Spencer's creek, would naturally look for the dividing ridge to conduct him to the pond and marked trees. The connected plat exhibits three ridges, one extending in a northern direction, between Slate and a branch of Spencer's creek; a second, extending westwardly up Spencer's creek, on the south side thereof, which is a dividing ridge between Spencer's creek and Greenbrier Creek, also a water of Slate; and a third, extending westwardly up Greenbrier on the south side thereof, which is a dividing ridge between Greenbrier and Brush *Creek, also a [*273] water of Slate. Which of these would he decide to be the dividing ridge between Spencer's creek and Slate; or can either of them be properly so called? It is contended, on the part of the appellants, that the ridge on the upper, or south side of Spencer's creek, would, in the general and common acceptance of men, be considered as the proper one. It may be admitted, that in many, perhaps in most cases, a call for the dividing ridge between two streams would generally be considered as designating that point above the one, and adjoining the other; but it must also be admitted, that in some cases it would not be so considered; it would depend on the direction or course of the streams, and the manner in which they are united with each other. If the general course of the one was south, and the other north, and the other running south, should turn east to form the junction, and the one running north should continue its course, then the land below the junction would by every person be considered as dividing the one stream from the other. Take as an example that branch of Spencer's creek called Harper's fork; suppose it the main stream, and that it formed a junction with Slate Creek instead of Spencer's creek, could a doubt exist that the land on the lower side was the dividing ridge between that stream and Slate Creek? The dividing ridge on the south side of Spencer's creek is, in truth and in fact, a dividing ridge between that creek and Greenbrier, another water of Slate, running nearly parallel with Spencer's creek, and forming a junction with Slate above it. The same *fact exists as to the dividing ridge be- [*274] tween Greenbrier and Brush creeks. The ridge, then, extending northwardly from the mouth of Spencer's creek might, with equal probability, be pursued as either of the others; it would lead to a pond, as designated on the connected plat 32. It is true, this pond is not proved to be a large one, and a subsequent locator on a view of it might conclude it did not answer the description of that called for in the entry. If he returned and pursued the ridge between Greenbrier and Brush creeks, he would be conducted to a pond, designated on the connected plat 38. This also is not a large pond, and may be considered as not answering the description. But supposing he should pursue the ridge on the south side of Spencer's creek, would it conduct him certainly to the pond No. 1., as designated on the connected plat? We think it very doubtful, from the proofs in the cause. It is not situate on the dividing ridge, but is nearly surrounded by the drains and branches of Greenbrier, is from 50 to 80 poles distant from the ridge, was nearly surrounded by high, strong, and thick canes; and, although from the testimony there appears to have been a good deal of conversation among the residents at Boonesborough respecting a large pond in this section of country, yet its precise situation was known only to a few, among some of whom existed an agreement to conceal their knowledge of it, and many of the residents at that place and its vicinity knew not, nor had heard anything respecting it; to which may be added, that the pond designated on the connected plat 275*] 37 is a large *pond, was also known to many, and possibly may have been the one spoken of in some of the general and loose conversations at Boonesborough; and it may be further observed, that the residents at Strode's and M'Gee's stations (which were the nearest ones), as well as many others, who were conversant in that section of country, had never seen, and did not know of, the pond No. 1, until a considerable time after the date of the entry. The court is, therefore, of opinion, that this pond was not so generally known, or could be so readily found, as to support and uphold this entry; and that it would be requiring more than ordinary and reasonable diligence to traverse and search all the dividing ridges represented on the connected plat.

But we are not satisfied that, according to the legal principles or well-settled rules for construing entries, Slate Creek can be substituted for Hingston's fork; on the contrary, we believe it would be making, rather than construing an entry. No case has been produced where this has been permitted, and it is believed none such exists. The counsel for the appellants contends, that as from the proofs in the cause it appears that Slate Creek was by many supposed to be Hingston, this circumstance would authorize such substitution. To this it may be answered, that this mistake existed among the hunters and locators at Boonesborough only, and that among them there were several who knew Slate Creek by its appropriate name; to which it may be added, that all the hunters and locators at Strode's and M'Gee's stations, as well as many others, also knew Slate 276*] Creek, and that it was *not a water of Hingston's fork; so that a majority of those conversant in that section of country did not labor under the mistake. We are therefore of opinion that it would be extending the rules of construction too far to make this substitution, in support of the mistake of a few, against the knowledge of the majority; if a substitution could be permitted in any case. We are farther of opinion that Hingston's fork was of more general notoriety than any of those streams, and ought not to be disregarded in construing this entry; that it is one of the prominent calls to ascertain its situation; and that a subsequent locator having arrived at Hingston's fork, and finding the pond designated on the plat 37, which is proved to have been known to many, and is little inferior in size to the pond 1, might rationally conclude that the locator of the entry under consideration had mistaken some western branch of Hingston for Spencer's creek; thus situated, he would conjecture, that an entry containing such incorrect, mistaken, or false calls, and requiring so much diligence and labor, was so doubtful and uncertain as to induce him to abandon further research. This entry, therefore, from a full view of all the proofs and circumstances, is deemed invalid, for want of that certainty and precision required by law.

In accordance with this opinion, is the decision of the Court of Appeals of the state of Kentucky, in the suit of Dnnleary against Reed and others, wherein the same entry was examined upon substantially the same evidence.

MANDEVILLE v. WELCH.

Bills of exchange and negotiable promissory notes are distinguished from all other parol contracts by the circumstance that they are prima facie evidence of valuable consideration, both between the original parties and against third persons.

Where a chose in action is assigned by the owner, he cannot interfere to defeat the rights of the assignee in the prosecution of a suit brought to enforce those rights.

It makes no difference, in this respect, whether the assignment be good at law, or in equity.

But this doctrine only applies to cases where the entire chose in action has been assigned, and not to a partial assignment.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for the District of Columbia. This was an action of covenant brought by the plaintiff, James Welch, for the use of Allen Prior, against the defendant Mandeville, one of the firm of Mandeville & Jamesson, for the breach of certain articles of agreement set forth in the declaration. Several pleas were pleaded by the defendant; but as the opinion of this court turned altogether upon the fourth set of pleadings, on which issue was joined, and at the trial a bill of exceptions taken, it is unnecessary to state the other pleadings.

The fourth plea alleged a release of the cause of action by the plaintiff before the commencement of the present suit. The plaintiff replied, in substance, that Welch being indebted to Allen Prior in a sum exceeding $8,707.09, and Mandeville & Jamesson being in- [*278 debted to Welch, by virtue of the covenant in the declaration mentioned, in the same sum of $8,707.09, Welch did, in the year 1799, appropriate, assign, and transfer to Prior, by a good and sufficient assignment in equity, the same debt due by reason of the same covenant, of which appropriation and assignment to the use and benefit of Prior, Mandeville, afterwards, in 1799, had notice; that the present suit was brought for the sole use and benefit of Prior, and Mandeville, at its commencement, had notice thereof, and knew the same suit was depending for the use and benefit of Prior, at the date of the pretended release; that the release was obtained without the knowledge, consent, or approbation of Prior, or of his attorney in court; and that Welch had no authority from Prior or his attorney to execute the release, which was known to Mandeville at the time of the release, and that the release was made with the intent to defraud Prior, and to deprive him of the benefit of this suit. To this replication, there was a rejoinder and issue, upon which the parties went to trial.

At the trial, the plaintiff, to prove that Welch did transfer and assign to Prior, by a good and sufficient assignment in equity, the debt in the replication mentioned, gave in evidence to the jury the articles of agreement in the declaration mentioned, and sundry indorsements of payments thereon, and a memorandum also, thereon, dated the 1st of January, 1798, and signed by Welch, stating that there then remained owing to him, on the articles payable at the times therein mentioned, the sum of 279* $8,707.09. *The plaintiff further offered three bills of exchange drawn by Welch, in favor of Prior, upon Mandeville & Jameson, dated on the 7th of September, 1799, each for $2,500, payable to Prior or his order; one on the 24th of November, 1800, another on the same day and month, 1801, and the third on the same day and month, 1803, being the respective times at which certain installments for like sums would become due on the articles of agreement stated in the declaration. Each of these bills purported to be "for value received" of Prior, and were directed to be charged "to account as advised." The plaintiff further offered in evidence to the jury an account rendered to Welch by Mandeville & Jameson, dated the 31st of January, 1798, stating the balance of $8,707.09, due to Welch, and payable by installments in the manner mentioned in the articles of agreement; and proved that this account had been delivered to Prior by Welch.

The defendant then gave in evidence the bill and proceedings in a suit in chancery in Fairfax county, by Prior, against Welch and Mandeville & Jameson (excepting the answers of the latter), which suit was brought to recover the amount of the three bills of exchange from Mandeville & Jameson, as debtors of Welch, and was discontinued by the plaintiff, Prior, after the answer of Welch had come in, denying that Prior was owner of the bills, and asserting that Prior held them merely as his agent, and for his use. And the defendant further proved that Welch had never authorized the present suit to *be brought, un- [*280] less the circumstances above stated would have given Prior authority to institute the same.

The defendant then prayed the court to instruct the jury, that if, from the evidence so given, they should be of opinion that the sums for which the bills were drawn amounted to less than the sums payable by Mandeville & Jameson to Welch, under the covenant, and were known to be less by Welch, then Prior is not such an assignee of the covenant as would authorize him to sustain this suit in the name of Welch. Which instruction the court gave; but further instructed the jury, that if they should be of opinion, from the evidence that the bills were drawn for the full and valuable consideration expressed on the face of them, paid by Prior to Welch, and if there was no other evidence than what is before stated, they ought to infer from the evidence that Prior was, and is such an assignee of the right of action upon the covenant as authorized him to sustain this action in the name of Welch's administrator (Welch having died pending the proceedings, and his administrator having been made party to the suit) for the whole debt due by the covenant at the time of Welch's delivering the account above stated to Prior; and further, that the bills were prima facie evidence of such value having been paid by Prior to Welch. The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff under this instruction; and the cause was brought before this court by a writ of error, to revise this among other supposed errors assigned upon the record.

**Mr. Swann and Mr. Taylor*, for the [*279] plaintiffs in error, argued: 1. That the court below erred in its instruction to the jury that the words "value received" were evidence against Mandeville & Jameson, that money had been actually paid by Prior to Welch, or the bills. Ellenborough held, that on a guaranty to pay for goods sold to a third person, the declarations of the latter were not evidence to charge the person giving the guaranty; because there might be collusion between the third person and the plaintiff. So in this case, if the defendant proved an assignment to him, Welch's declaration, that he had previously assigned to the plaintiff, would not be admissible, and his declaration in writing cannot have any greater effect. 2. It was not the intention of Welch, and of Prior, that the whole covenant should be assigned, nor does the law imply such an assignment. The bills are general, not payable out of any particular fund, and there is no proof of any agreement between Welch and Prior that the latter should have a lien on the funds in the hands of Mandeville & Jamesson. The legal consequence of the decision of the court below is, that the drawing of a bill of exchange amounts, per se, to an assignment in law of the funds of the drawer in the hands of the drawee, so as to authorize a suit in the name of the [280*] drawer, without his consent, against the drawee, and when recourse might be had to the former. There is no case to support the idea that the drawing of a bill, under any circumstances, will amount to an assignment at law. Cases, indeed, have occurred, where, under peculiar circumstances, a court of equity has considered the drawing of a bill as giving to the payee a superior claim or equitable lien. Thus, in the case of Yeates v. Groves,<sup>1</sup> the creditor surrendered a security he held, under an express agreement that he should be paid out of the money to arise from a particular specified fund, on which the bill was drawn, and the drawer became bankrupt. But the proposition, that the drawing of a bill on a specific fund would, per se, have created such a lien, is repelled by Lord Thurlow. It would be highly impolitic to consider the drawing of a bill, under any circumstances, as amounting to an assignment, or creating a lien, in a court of law. These questions generally arise on the bankruptcy of the drawer. His general creditors have an interest, and ought to be heard. They cannot be made parties to a suit at law.

Mr. Jones and Mr. Lee, contra, insisted: 1. That bills and negotiable notes expressing upon their face "value received" are evidence of that fact, both as between the original parties and against third persons. 2. The facts and circumstances of the case establish by legal inference that the articles of agreement were wholly assigned in equity. The bills [281*] being prima facie evidence of an equivalent advance by Prior, the possession by him of the articles of agreement, and the delivery to him of the account signed by Mandeville & Jamesson, furnish a legal presumption that both were delivered as security for the payment of the advance. He thus acquired a lien on them similar to that acquired by the delivery of title deeds as security for a debt, which lien has always been deemed by courts of equity equivalent to a mortgage.<sup>2</sup> So, also, the deposit of a note or bill, as security for a debt, entitles the creditor to enforce his lien in equity.<sup>3</sup> But supposing this position not to be correct, still it is contended that there was here a partial lien or appropriation of the debt due from Mandeville & Jamesson under the articles, to the extent of the sums due on the bills, which is sufficient to authorize Prior to maintain this action. The drawing of a bill of exchange is, in itself, an assignment by the drawer to the payee of the money due from the drawee. The acceptance is not necessary to make the assignment complete, but only to give an action against the drawee in the name of the payee.<sup>4</sup> In the case of Clark v. Adair, cited by Mr. Justice Buller in Masters v. Miller,<sup>5</sup> it was determined that an unaccepted bill was such an assignment as entitled the payee to the money. In Yeates v. Groves,<sup>6</sup> an order to pay out of a particular fund, though not accepted, was considered such a transfer as to prevent the assignee of the party, who became bankrupt after drawing the order, from claiming the fund on which the order was drawn.

Mr. Justice STORY delivered the opinion of the court: Two questions arise upon the instruction to the jury: 1. Whether the bills were prima facie evidence that value had been paid for them by Prior to Welch. 2. Whether, under all the circumstances of the case, Prior was an assignee in equity entitled to maintain the present action.

Upon the first point, we are of opinion that the law was correctly laid down by the court below. The argument of the defendant's counsel admits, that where a bill imports on its face to be for "value received," it is prima facie evidence of that fact between the original parties; but it is stated that it is not evidence of the fact against third persons. We know of no such distinction. In all cases where the bill can be used as evidence either against the parties or against third persons, the same legal presumption arises of its having been given for value received, as exists in relation to a deed expressed to be given for a valuable consideration. In this respect, bills of exchange and negotiable notes are distinguished from all other parol contracts, by authorities which are not now to be questioned.<sup>7</sup>

The other question requires more consideration, though it does not, in our judgment, present any intrinsic difficulty. It has been long since settled, that where a chose in action is assigned by the owner, he shall not be permitted fraudulently to interfere and defeat the rights of the assignee in the prosecution of any suit to enforce those rights. And it has not been deemed to make any difference whether the assignment be good at law, or in equity only. This doctrine was fully recognized by this court when this case was formerly before us.<sup>1</sup> It was then applied to a case where the whole chose in action was alleged to have been assigned; and it was certainly then supposed that the doctrine in courts of law had never been pressed to a greater extent. We are now called upon to press it still further, so as to embrace cases of partial assignments of choses in action.

It is contended on behalf of the plaintiff, in the first place, that the facts of this case establish by legal inference that the articles of agreement were entirely assigned in equity to the plaintiff. If this ground fails, it is in the next place contended that an assignment was made of the debt due by the articles to the extent of $7,500, the amount of the bills drawn on Mandeville & Jamesson, and that 284]* this, per se, authorizes Prior to sustain the present action.

In support of the first position, it is argued, that the bills being prima facie evidence of an equivalent advance made by Prior, the possession by the latter of the articles of agreement, and the delivery to him of the account signed by Mandeville & Jamesson, afford a legal presumption that the articles and account were delivered to him as security for the payment of such advance, and thereby he acquired a lien on them like that acquired by the delivery of title deeds as security for a debt, which lien has always been deemed to be equivalent to an equitable mortgage. It may be admitted, that according to the course of the authorities in England, and as applicable to the state of land titles there, a deposit of title deeds does, in the cases alluded to, create a lien, which will be recognized as an equitable mortgage, and will entitle the party to call for an assignment of the property included in the title deeds. It may also be admitted, that a deposit of a note not negotiable, as security for a debt, will entitle the creditor, after notice to the maker, to enforce in equity his lien against the depositor, and his assignees in bankruptcy. Such was the case cited at the bar from Atkyn's Reports.<sup>2</sup> But in cases of this nature, the doctrine proceeds upon the supposition that the deposit is clearly established to have been made as security for the debt; and not upon the ground that the mere fact of a deposit unexplained affords 285]* such proof. In the case at the bar, it was not proved that the articles were delivered by Welch to Prior at all, much less that they were delivered as security for the bills. The delivery of the account is certainly an equivocal act, and might have been as a voucher of the right of Welch to draw on Mandeville & Jamesson. There is this farther deficiency in the proof, that the bills do not appear ever to have been presented to the drawees for acceptance, which not only rebuts the presumption from the face of the bills that they were received for value, since a bona fide holder could not be supposed guilty of such fatal laches, but draws after it the auxiliary presumption that they were in the hands of Prior as agent, and, therefore, that he had not any assignment of the articles as security. And it may be added, that the suit commenced in chancery by Prior, for this very debt, and afterwards discontinued, does not assert any assigned title in himself, but proceeds against Mandeville & Jamesson, as the mere debtors of Welch. Under such circumstances, this court cannot say that the instruction of the Circuit Court was correct, that the jury ought to infer that Prior was an assignee, entitled to sue for the whole debt due upon the articles.

The ground, then, that there was a deposit of the articles as collateral security failing, we are next led to examine the position of the defendant's counsel, that there was a partial lien or appropriation of the debt due from Mandeville & Jamesson, under the articles to the extent of the sum due on the bills, which is equivalent to an equitable assignment of so *much of the debt. It is said that a [*286 bill of exchange is, in theory, an assignment to the payee of a debt due from the drawee to the drawer. This is undoubtedly true, where the bill has been accepted, whether it be drawn on general funds or a specific fund, and whether the bill be in its own nature negotiable or not; for in such a case, the acceptor, by his assent, binds, and appropriates the funds for the use of the payee. And to this effect are the authorities cited at the bar.<sup>3</sup> In cases also where an order is drawn for the whole of a particular fund, it amounts to an equitable assignment of that fund, and after notice to the drawee it binds the fund in his hand. But where the order is drawn either on a general or a particular fund, for a part only, it does not amount to an assignment of that part, or give a lien as against the drawee, unless he consent to the appropriation by an acceptance of the draft; or an obligation to accept may be fairly implied from the custom of trade, or the course of business between the parties as a part of their contract. The reason of this principle is plain. A creditor shall not be permitted to split up a single cause of action into many actions, without the assent of his debtor, since it may subject him to many embarrassments and responsibilities not contemplated in his original contract. He has a right to stand upon the singleness of his original contract, and to decline any legal or equitable assignments by which it may be broken *into frag- [*289 ments. When he undertakes to pay an integral sum to his creditor, it is no part of his contract that he shall be obliged to pay in fractions to any other persons. So that if the plaintiff could show a partial assignment to the extent of the bills, it would not avail him in support of the present suit. But, in the present case, there is no proof of any presentment of the bills, much less of any acceptance by the defendant to establish even a partial assignment of the debt. And if there were, it would still be necessary to show that there was an assignment of the articles as an attendant security, before the plaintiff could found his action upon them. Indeed, by the very terms of the pleadings, the plaintiff undertakes to establish an assignment of the whole debt due by the articles; and if he fails in this, there is an end to his recovery. So that, in whatever view we contemplate the facts of this case, or the law applicable to it, the plaintiff has not shown any sufficient title to sustain his replication to the fourth plea.

Several other objections have been taken at the bar to the plaintiff's right of recovery, which, under other circumstances, would have deserved serious consideration; but as, upon the merits of the case, as they are apparent upon the record, the judgment of this court is decidedly against the plaintiff, it is unnecessary to give any opinion upon those objections.

Judgment reversed.

JUDGMENT.—This cause came on to be heard 290* on the transcript of the record of the Circuit Court for the District of Columbia in the county of Alexandria, and was argued by counsel. On consideration whereof, this court is of opinion that the said Circuit Court erred in instructing the jury, "that if they should be of opinion, from the evidence, that the said bills were drawn for the full and valuable consideration expressed on the face of them, paid by the said Prior to the said Welch, and if there be no other evidence than what is hereinbefore stated, they ought to infer from the said evidence that the said Prior was, and is such an assignee of the right of action upon the covenant aforesaid as authorizes him to sustain the action in the name of the said Welch's administrator for the whole debt due by the said covenant, at the time of the said Welch's delivering the said account to the said Prior." It is therefore adjudged and ordered, that the judgment of the said Circuit Court in this case be, and the same is hereby reversed and annulled. And it is further ordered, that the said cause be remanded to the said Circuit Court, with directions to issue a venire facias de novo.

WALLACE v. ANDERSON.

An information for a quo warranto, to try the title to an office, cannot be maintained but at the instance of the government; and the consent of parties will not give jurisdiction in such a case.

ERROR to the Circuit Court of Ohio.

This was an information for a quo warranto, brought to try the title of the defendant to the office of principal surveyor of the Virginia military bounty lands north of the river Ohio, and between the rivers Sciota and Little Miami. The defendant had been appointed to the office by the state of Virginia, and continued to exercise its duties until the year 1818, during a which time his official acts were recognized by the United States. In that year he was removed by the Governor and council of Virginia, and the plaintiff appointed in his place. The writ was brought, by consent of parties, to try the title to the office, waiving all questions of form, and of jurisdiction. Judgment was given in the court below for the defendant, and the cause was brought by writ of error to this court.

The cause was argued by Mr. Hardin for the plaintiff, and by the Attorney-General and Mr. Scott, for the defendant. But as the cause was dismissed for want of jurisdiction, it is deemed unnecessary to insert the argument.

**Mr. Chief Justice MARSHALL* delivered the opinion of the court, that a writ of quo warranto could not be maintained except at the instance of the government, and as this writ was issued by a private individual, without the authority of the government, it could not be sustained, whatever might be the right of the prosecutor, or of the person claiming to exercise the office in question. The information must therefore be dismissed.

Judgment reversed.

JUDGMENT.—This cause came on to be heard on the transcript of the record of the Circuit Court for the District of Ohio, and was argued by counsel. On consideration whereof, this court is of opinion that no writ of quo warranto can be maintained, but at the instance of the government; and as this is a writ issued by an individual without the authority of government, it is the opinion of this court that the same cannot be sustained, whatever may be the right of that individual, or of the person who claims to exercise the office, to try the title to which, the writ is brought. It is therefore, the opinion of this court, that the judgment of the Circuit Court ought to be reversed, and the cause remanded to that court, with directions to dismiss the information because it is not filed at the instance of the United States.

NOTE.—The writ of quo warranto was in the nature of a writ of right for the king, against him who claimed or usurped any office, franchise, or liberty, to inquire by what authority he supported his claim, in order to determine the right.

3 Bl. Com. 262.

The quo warranto at common law was a criminal proceeding; and in addition to the judgment of seizure, or of ouster, there was judgment that the defendants be taken to make fine to the king for the usurpation. The information in the nature of a quo warranto, under the statute of New York, was strictly a criminal proceeding, being for the usurpation of a state prerogative.

It was held to be so far a criminal proceeding in the cases of Rex v. Bennett (1 Str. 101), Wheat. 5.

and of The King v. Jones (8 Mod. 201), that the king's bench did not deem itself authorized even to award a new trial. But it is now so far considered a civil proceeding that a new trial may be granted. King v. Francis, 2 Term. R. 484. But this was not decisive as to whether it be properly of a civil or criminal nature, for the power to award new trials was subsequently exercised in all cases of misdemeanors. 6 Term. R. 638.

In New York, the writ of quo warranto, and proceedings by information in the nature of quo warranto are abolished; and the remedies heretofore obtainable in those forms are now obtained by civil actions under the code of procedure. Code, s. 428; 4 Seld (N. Y.) 71.

POLK'S LESSEE v. WENDELL ET AL.

There are cases in which a grant is absolutely void; as where the state has no title to the thing granted, or where the officer had no authority to issue the grant, &c. In such cases, the validity of the grant is necessarily examinable at law.

A grant raises a presumption that every prerequisite to its issuing was complied with, and a warrant is evidence of the existence of an entry; but where the entry has never in fact been made, and the warrant is forged, no right accrues under the act of North Carolina of 1777, and the grant is void.

Where a party, in order to prove that there were no entries to authorize the issuing of the warrants, offered to give in evidence certified copies of warrants from the same office, of the same dates and numbers, but to different persons, and for different quantities of lands: Held, that this was competent evidence to prove the positive fact of the existence of the entries specified in the copies; but that in order to have a negative effect in disproving the entries alleged to be spurious, the whole abstract ought to be produced in court, or inspected under a commission, or the keeper of the document examined as a witness, from which the court might ascertain the fact of the non-existence of the contested entries.

In such a case, certificates from the secretary's office of North Carolina, introduced to prove that on the entries of the same dates with those alleged to be spurious, other warrants issued, and other grants were obtained in the name of various individuals, but none to the party claiming under the alleged spurious entries, is competent circumstantial evidence to be left to the jury. In such a case, parol evidence, that the warrants and locations had been rejected by the entry-taker as spurious, is inadmissible.

It seems that, whether a grant be absolutely void, or voidable only, a junior grantee is not, by the law of Tennessee, permitted to avail himself of its nullity as against an innocent purchaser without notice.

ERROR to the Circuit Court of West Tennessee. This was an action of ejectment, 294* for five thousand acres of land, in the state of Tennessee, granted by the Governor of North Carolina to Polk, the lessor of the plaintiff, on the 6th of May, 1800, on a warrant from John Armstrong's office, dated May 25th, 1784. The defendants, who were proved to be in possession of part of this tract, claimed title under a grant from the Governor of North Carolina to John Seveir, for twenty-five thousand and sixty acres, bearing date on the 28th of August, 1795. This grant appears by the annexed certificate of survey to be founded on forty land warrants of six hundred and forty acres each, numbered from 1634 to 1676, and surveyed in one entire tract. The land in dispute was proved to lie within the lines of Seveir's grant. The plaintiff having proved that John Carter was entry-taker of Washington county until February 28th, 1780, and that Landon Carter was then appointed, offered in evidence an office copy of an abstract (marked K. in the transcript) of the warrants, on which Seveir's survey and grant were founded; the original book of entries being destroyed. From this copy it appeared that all the warrants were issued from the Washington county office in April or May, 1780, to the surveyor of Sullivan county, and purported to be founded on entries which bore date on the 16th of September, 1779. They were all signed "Landon Carter, entry-taker." He also produced, and offered to give in evidence, office copies of warrants from the same office (marked H. and L. in the transcript), of the same dates and numbers, but to different persons, and for different quantities of land. These warrants appeared *to be issued by John Carter; [*295 and were offered, like Seveir's warrants, for the purpose of showing that the latter were spurious, and, consequently, that Seveir's grant was void. The plaintiff also offered in evidence a grant of Seveir for 32,000 acres, dated 27th of November, 1795, which purported to be founded on thirty-six warrants, all of them, except the two first on alleged entries, dated on the same 16th of September, 1779. He also offered to prove that the two first warrants had been satisfied by prior grants, and in respect to the others, that warrants for the same numbers issued to other persons, and were recognized in the abstract of Carter's entry-book, but none of Seveir's. The plaintiff also offered to prove that the warrants and locations of Seveir had been insinuated, in 1794 or 1795, into the entry-taker's office without his knowledge; that they were rejected by the entry-taker as spurious, and that the locations were in Seveir's handwriting. The plaintiff also offered to give in evidence a report to the legislature of Tennessee, of November 8th, 1803, declaring all Seveir's warrants to be fraudulent fabrications. All this testimony was overruled and rejected by the court, to which the plaintiff excepted. A verdict was taken, and judgment rendered for the defendants, and the cause was brought by writ of error to this court.

Mr. Harper and Mr. Gaston, for the plaintiff, argued: 1. That it was competent for the plaintiff to show that no entries had been made in the land-office of North Carolina, and that therefore the governor had no power to issue the grant. The act of 1777, c. 1, s. 3, makes the entry the first essential *and [*296 indispensable requisite to obtaining a title to vacant land. The 5th section points out the difference between location, entry, and warrant. The entries are the foundation of the claim, and are all to be numbered in the order in which they are made. The 9th section de-all the rules which regulated the proceedings under the former practice. 30 Barb. 501.

The modern information, in the nature of the writ of quo warranto, tends to the same purpose as the ancient writ; being properly a criminal prosecution, in order to fine the defendant for his usurpation, as well as to oust him from his office; yet is usually considered at present as merely a civil proceeding.

clares every right obtained in any other manner "utterly void." This section follows the directions in regard to the entry, and makes a valid entry the one thing needful. In the construction of this statute, it has been settled in the courts of North Carolina that no legal title is created until the grant; and that the elder grant, though founded on a junior entry, is, at law, to be preferred to a junior grant on an elder title; that an equitable interest is acquired by the first entry, which is to be enforced as other equitable titles are enforced. It is also settled, that when a grant issues, it furnishes sufficient prima facie evidence that all the prerequisites of the law have been complied with, and that it cannot be avoided by showing irregularities in the conduct of the officers who superintended the progress of the claim from the entry to the grant. There have been loose dicta, unsatisfactory and inconclusive reasonings, from which other inferences have been drawn. But it is denied that it ever was law in North Carolina that a grant should be good if it could be clearly shown that it was not founded on an entry, but was wholly fraudulent. It would have been impossible to pronounce such a decision without a violation of the plain, strong words of the 9th section of the act, "shall be deemed, and are hereby declared utterly void." Such 297]* a decision, too,* would have been inconsistent with the first principles of the common law, fraud being the object of its peculiar abhorrence, and contaminating every act.<sup>1</sup> Courts of common law have a concurrent jurisdiction with courts of equity in all cases of frauds.<sup>2</sup>

It is impossible that a grant, begun and ended in fraud, where there has been no claim entered, nor purchase made from the state, should be valid. If, however, a doubt could exist in the case of a grant issuing before the year 1789, assuredly none can be entertained on a grant made by the Governor of North Carolina since the cession of the territory, which now forms the state of Tennessee, to the United States. By the act of cession, the sovereignty and domain are relinquished by North Carolina, and a mere ministerial power is reserved to the governor of that state to perfect grants; "where entries have been made agreeably to law, and the titles not perfected." The state has no longer authority to dispose of the lands. She is no longer their proprietor. The governor has a mere naked power, unconnected with an interest, to make grants where entries have been previously made. A grant issued where no entry has been made, is an act wholly unsupported by the power, and cannot possibly transfer an interest. The whole question has, in fact, been already settled by the reasoning and decision of this court, when this case was 298]* formerly before it.<sup>3</sup> *2. The evidence offered by the plaintiff was proper in itself, and relevant to show that no entries had been made, prior to the cession, authorizing the Governor of North Carolina to make a grant to Sevier. The best evidence was offered of the pretended warrant on which his grant was founded, and, also, to show that other warrants existed of precisely the same numbers. This alone raised a presumption that one or the other must have been spurious. According to the act of 1777, c. 1, s. 5, there could not possibly be two sets of entries of the same numbers, without the most extraordinary negligence. This testimony ought to have gone to the jury, even if there had been no other. It should have been left to them to decide which of the two sets of warrants was spurious under the peculiar circumstances of the case. But it was supported by corroborating evidence of great weight; by the abstract of Carter's entries. The competency of this evidence may be maintained both on the ground of common law principles and on special enactments of the local legislature. It is the best which the nature of the case admits of. Works compiled by authority and order of the government of the country, on public occasions, and on subjects of public interest, are recognized as authentic documents in courts of justice, and admitted as evidence in matters of private right. Such are, in England, the celebrated Domesday Book; the Survey of King's Ports; the Valor Beneficiorum;<sup>4</sup> copies of Surveys of Church and Crown Lands; *kept in un- [*299 suspected repositories.<sup>5</sup> The day-book of a prison, containing a narrative of the transactions there, is proof of the time of a prisoner's commitment.<sup>6</sup> So, terriers are evidence of manorial boundaries, either when found in the regular repositories or in places where the custody can be satisfactorily explained.<sup>7</sup> But, in this case, there are positive statutes of the legislature of Tennessee by which this book of entries and copies from it are made evidence.<sup>8</sup> In addition to all this, was the parol evidence. The introduction of these locations and warrants into the office in 1795, in a secret manner, betrayed a consciousness that they had not before existed there. This accumulation of proof fully established the plaintiff's allegation; or, at all events, it had a tendency to establish it, and its sufficiency ought to have been left to the jury. As to the legislative report, there is some reason to believe that the legislature of Tennessee intended, by their act of 1807, c. 82, to make it evidence. At least it might have been proper evidence to bring home notice to the defendants, prior to their purchase.

The Attorney-General and Mr. Williams, contra, insisted: 1. That the proceedings on which a grant issues are to be presumed to be correct. They constitute a question between the state and the grantee *only. Be- [*300 tween private parties, evidence dehors the patent is wholly inadmissible at law.<sup>9</sup> 2. The testimony offered in this case was clearly inadmissible upon the principles of the former decision of this court, in which, it may be added, that the court has gone further than the local courts in permitting inquiries into facts occurring prior to the issuing of a grant.<sup>1</sup> The court below gave no opinion upon any specific evidence, but on the general question, and rejected the whole testimony, which was offered to prove that the warrants were forged. But in order to prove this, the production of the warrants was indispensable, and no inferior proof ought to have been received. The abstract is defective, because it is only of a part of a record, when it ought to be of the whole, and so certified. It is a part only of a copy of a copy. The attempt to infer the spuriousness of the warrants from the identity of the numbers, was justly repelled, because the same numbers are often given to many warrants, and it can seldom be shown on what entry the grant issued. The report of the select committee of the legislature was also inadmissible as evidence; both because there is no proof that it was ever acted on by the house and because the state of Tennessee had, at the time, no authority over the lands, North Carolina having retained the right of completing titles originating before the cession. 3. But, even 301* supposing the grant under *which the defendants claim to have been fraudulently obtained by the original grantees, as they are bona fide purchasers without notice, they are entitled to the protection of the court.<sup>2</sup> The courts of Tennessee have established the doctrine, that even in the case of a void grant, a junior grantee shall not avail himself of its nullity as against an innocent purchaser without notice.<sup>3</sup>

Mr. Justice JOHNSON delivered the opinion of the court: Both these titles are founded on what are called removed warrants, and priority of entry is altogether immaterial to the issue. But the existence of an entry, it is contended on behalf of the plaintiff, is indispensable to the issuing of a warrant of survey, and to the validity of grants, which ought by law to have their origin in such entries. With a view, therefore, to impeach the prior grant to Sevier, under which these defendants claim, the plaintiff proposes to prove that there never were in fact any entries made to justify the issuing of the warrants under which their title had its inception. It has been also suggested, that his intention further was to prove the warrants themselves forgeries. But this does not appear from the bill of exceptions, as will be more particularly shown when we come to analyze it, with a view of determining what evidence appears to have been rejected in the Circuit Court. 302* The evidence offered in the court below, with a view to invalidating Sevier's grant, was rejected, and on the writ of error to this court, one general question arises, whether any, and if any, what evidence of facts, prior to the issuing of a grant, shall be received to invalidate it.

When the case was before this court, in the year 1815, the same question was brought to its notice, and received its most earnest and anxious attention. Long experience had satisfied the mind of every member of the court of the glaring impolicy of ever admitting an inquiry beyond the dates of the grants under which lands are claimed. But the peculiar situation of Kentucky and Tennessee, with relation to the parent states of Virginia and North Carolina, and the statutory provisions and course of decisions that have grown out of that relation, has imposed upon this court the necessity of pursuing a course which nothing but necessity could have reconciled to its ideas of law or policy. The sole object for which jurisdiction of cases, between citizens of different states, is vested in the courts of the United States, is to secure to all the administration of justice, upon the same principles on which it is administered between citizens of the same state. Hence, this court has never hesitated to conform to the settled doctrines of the states on landed property, where they are fixed, and can be satisfactorily ascertained; nor would it ever be led to deviate from them, in any case that bore the semblance of impartial justice.

It has been supposed, that in the former decision alluded to in this case, this court has gone beyond *the decisions of the courts [303 of Tennessee, in opening the door to inquiries into circumstances occurring prior to the issuing of a grant.

An attentive perusal of that decision will detect the error; or prove, if it has done so, it has done it on principles that cannot be controverted.

It is obvious from the report of the decision that it was at that time presented under an aspect somewhat different from that in which it now appears. The forgery of the warrants constituted a part of the case which the plaintiff was precluded from making out in evidence. And to collect the purport of the decision, at that time rendered, the best resort will be to the words in which it is delivered.

Two sentences will give the substance of that decision. They are expressed in the following words: "But there are cases in which a grant is absolutely void; as where the state has no title to the thing granted, or where the officer had no authority to issue the grant. In such cases, the validity of the grant is necessarily examinable at law." And "If, as the plaintiff offered to prove, the entries were never made, and the warrants were forgeries, then no right accrued under the act of 1777; no purchase of the land was made from the state; and independent of the act of cession to the United States, the grant is void by the express words of the law."

These two sentences comprise the substance of that decision. For, as to the doubts expressed in the last paragraph of the opinion, relative to the inception of a right in the ceded territory prior to the cession, it is but a doubt, and is removed by a reference *to the [304 6th section of the act of 1784. As to the question what evidence shall be sufficient to prove the existence of the entry, the court is silent. As to what validity shall be given to the grants emanating from North Carolina, the decision places it upon the statutes of North Carolina. And although an opinion is expressed that North Carolina could make no new grants after the cession, who could have entertained a doubt upon that question? The right reserved to her—was to perfect incipient grants; but what restraint is imposed upon her discretion? or what doubt suggested of her good faith in executing that power?

It will be perceived, that as to irregularities committed by the officers of government prior to the grant, the court does not express a doubt but that the government, and not the individual, must bear the consequences resulting from them. On the contrary, it declares that the existence of the grant is, in itself, a sufficient ground, from which every man may infer that every prerequisite has been performed. All, then, that it decides is, that an entry was indispensable as the inception of a title to Sevier; that if an original grant had issued to him after the cession, or a title had been perfected where there was no incipient title before the cession, as in the case of a grant on a forged warrant, and no entry, that it would be void. But, in admitting that the grant shall support the presumption that every prerequisite existed, it necessarily admits that a warrant shall be evidence of the existence of an entry. Nor is it by any means conclusive to the contrary that 305 the entry does not appear upon the abstract of entries in Washington county, recorded in the secretary's office. On the contrary, if the warrants issued are signed by the entry-taker, it is conclusive that the locations were received by him, and if he omitted to enter them, his neglect ought not to prejudice the rights of him in whose favor the warrants were issued.

That an entry is necessary to give validity to these grants, we think not only perfectly deducible from the statutory provisions in force in Tennessee, but also from the legal adjudications of their courts. Nay, they have not assumed the principle, that the issuing of the grant shall be deemed a recognition of the legal sufficiency of an entry; but have decided a grant void which emanated from an entry not sanctioned by the statutes of North Carolina, though the grant was issued when it might have lawfully issued. (Jackson v. Honeycutt, 1 Tenn. Rep., 30.) And in the case of Dodson v. Cocke & Stewart, so much relied on in the argument, the legal validity of a grant is expressly referred to the validity of the entry at the time it was made. (Id. 232.) It would, indeed, be wonderful if it were otherwise, since it is the acknowledged law of Tennessee, that a prior entry will give precedence to a junior grant; a principle which obviously supposes the entry to be of the essence of the transfer of property; the grant, that which gives it palpable existence; or, at least, that it holds the freehold in abeyance, ready to vest upon the contingency of the expected grant.

It has also been asserted, that the courts of the state of Tennessee have frequently, and uniformly 306 formally, decided directly the reverse of the opinion of the Supreme Court. This assertion has reference to that part of the opinion which declares, that a grant issuing "without entry, and on forged warrants," is a void grant. Such an idea could only have resulted from inattention to the obvious distinction between the acts of the state's agents or officers and the impositions practiced upon them; between the case of a right really incipient, and that where no right ever did exist. How could the state of North Carolina have been performing an act toward perfecting a right, where, by the supposed case no right could possibly have existed, no entry ever was made, and the warrant forged? A new grant, it must be admitted, she could not have made; but would not this have been a new grant? We will respect the decisions of the state tribunals, but there are limits which no court can transcend.

But the courts of Tennessee have not so decided. In the case of Dodson v. Cocke & Stewart, it will be found that the marginal note of the decision is too general in its expression, and that the court decides nothing but what has been expressly admitted by this court, since the legal validity of the entry is made the very basis of that decision. So of the case of Serier & Anderson v. Hill, the only point on which the judges seem to have coincided was, that no other consideration should be proved than what the grant expressed on the face of it (see the opinion of Judge Humphreys). If any other point is decided, it is immaterial to the present question.

*This court disavows having ever de- 307 cided more than that an entry, or other legal incipency of title, was necessary to the validity of a grant issued by North Carolina, for lands in Tennessee, after the separation. They have never expressed an inclination to let in inquiries into the frauds, irregularities, acts of negligence, or of ignorance of the officers of government, prior to the issuing of the grant; but, on the contrary, have expressed the opinion that the government must bear the consequences. But while they admit that a genuine warrant shall be in itself the evidence of an entry, they cannot yield to the absurdity of attaching that effect to a forged warrant.

With regard to the decisions of the state of North Carolina, it is a well-known fact, that on the subject of the effect of entries, the courts of the two states are at direct variance. And, singular as it may seem, opposite constructions of the same laws constitute rules of decision to their respective courts. And if it is the law upon their own citizens, we are willing to apply the same rules of property to all others. But even the courts of that state, in their rigid adherence to the dates and effect of grants, and the principle that they are not void but voidable, are sometimes driven to the most awkward shifts in adjudicating on cases affected by the act of 1777. Thus, in The Trustees of the University v. Surger (Taylor's Rep., 114), they have said, that although "they cannot declare a grant void, they will adjudge that the grantee takes nothing under it." And in a case decided in 1802 (N. Carolina Rep., 441), they have found 308 themselves compelled, under their acts of 1777, 1778 and 1783, to declare a grant absolutely void, on the ground of the invalidity of the entry with reference to facts that required the intervention of a jury. So that it would seem even in North Carolina a valid entry was indispensable to a valid grant. That priority of entry would not give priority to a junior grant is certainly decided in the case of Williams v. Wells, reported in the North Carolina Law Repository, 383. But even that point, it would seem, had not been well established as a principle of law, since the jury in that case (which is a recent one) manifested their dissatisfaction with the charge of the court, by finding against it.

There was one point made in the argument of this case, which, from its general importance, merits our serious attention, and which may have entered into the views of the Circuit Court in making their decision. It was, whether, admitting this grant to be void, innocent purchasers without notice, holding under it, should be affected by its nullity.

This would seem to depend on the question, whether we shall, as to innocent purchasers, view it as a void or voidable grant.

On general principles, it is incontestable, that a grantee can convey no more than he possesses. Hence, those who came in under the holder of a void grant can acquire nothing. But it is clear that the courts of the state of Tennessee have held otherwise. In Miller v. Holt (1 Tenn. Rep., 111), it is expressly adjudged, that 309*] whether a grant be *void or voidable, a junior grantee shall not avail himself of its nullity as against an innocent purchaser without notice. Yet the North Carolina act of 1777 certainly declares grants obtained by fraud to be absolutely void. And the same result must follow where the state has relinquished its power to grant, or no law exists to support the validity of a grant. But it seems that the courts of Tennessee have adopted this distinction, that grants in such cases shall be deemed void only as against the state, and not then until adjudged so by some process of law. That as between individuals, the title shall be held to vest sub modo, and innocent purchasers, without notice, shall not be ousted by the intervention of a subsequent grantee.

If this be the settled law of Tennessee, we are satisfied that it should rest on the authority of adjudication. There is certainly a palpable distinction between the cases of an original grantee and a subsequent purchaser without notice. There can be no reason why the grantee should be favored by the leaning of courts; but the latter, finding the grantee in possession of the patent of the state, which on its face presents nothing to put him on his guard, has strong claims upon the favor of courts, and the justice of the country.

Upon analyzing the bill of exceptions, it will be found that the plaintiff does not propose to prove in express terms that the warrants in this case were forgeries. But, with a view to proving that there were no entries to authorize the issuing of the warrants, he tenders various 310*] certified documents from *the several offices of North Carolina and Tennessee, from which he would raise an inference that it was impossible that such entries could have existed; and then tenders parol evidence to prove that the locations on which the warrants purport to have issued had never been passed to entry, and together with the warrants and surveys founded upon them had been rejected by a particular entry-taker (the successor of him who is supposed to have issued these warrants), on the ground of their being spurious and invalid. Also, that they had been reported as spurious by a committee of the Tennessee legislature.

As the exception does not come up on a misdirection of the court, but generally on the rejection of the evidence offered, the only remaining questions arise on its legal competency.

And, first, we are of opinion that the document marked K. in the transcript of the record was competent evidence to prove the fact of the existence of the entries therein specified, and so far it ought to have been admitted, because it is expressly made evidence by the act of the 21st of September, 1801. But, as far as a negative use was intended to be made of that abstract, we are of opinion, the certificate of the officer was properly rejected. There is no such effect given either to that document or the clerk's certificate, by any legislative act, and such an effect could only be given to the production of the whole abstract, from which the court might, by inspection, have ascertained the fact of the non-existence of the contested entries; or from an examination *of the [311 keeper of that document as an ordinary witness, or inspection of it made under a commission.

The documents offered, marked H. & L., were numerous certificates from the secretary's office of North Carolina, of warrants and grants, introduced to prove that on the entries of the dates specified as the dates of the entries to Sevier, other warrants issued, and other grants were obtained in the name of various individuals, but none to Sevier. This evidence, also, we are of opinion, was competent circumstantial evidence, and ought not to have been wholly rejected.

With regard to the report of the committee of the house, we can hardly think it could have been seriously offered; and the parol evidence respecting the rejection by the subsequent entry-taker, was also properly rejected, inasmuch as the rejection of the return of these warrants and surveys was a perfectly immaterial circumstance upon this issue. It might as well have been the result of that entry-taker's folly, or his wrong, as of any other cause. The emanation of the grant is sufficient evidence that the claim of Sevier must have met with a more favorable reception from a higher quarter. Upon the whole, the only ground on which we could sustain the decision in the court below is, that a subsequent purchaser without notice is not to be affected by any legal defects in a grant which might have issued conformably to existing laws. For, in that case, all the evidence rejected may have been immaterial to the issue. But, non constat, that the evidence rejected was *not connected with proof to rebut that [312 defense. It is, therefore, not necessary here to decide definitively on that point of the law. If it is the received doctrine of the Tennessee courts, we have expressed our inclination not to shake it. But the cause must necessarily be sent back upon the rejection of the documents marked H. K. & L.

Judgment reversed.

JUDGMENT.—This cause came on to be heard on the transcript of the record of the Circuit Court for the District of West Tennessee, and was argued by counsel. On consideration whereof, it is the opinion of this court that there is error in the proceedings of the said Circuit Court in rejecting the documents marked in the transcript of the record with the letters H. K. & L., as incompetent evidence. It is therefore adjudged and ordered, that the judgment of the Circuit Court, for the District of

MARSHALL v. P. R. BEVERLEY.

In equity, a final decree cannot be pronounced until all parties in interest are brought before the court.

Where a bill was filed for a perpetual injunction, on judgments obtained on certain bills of exchange drawn by the plaintiff, and negotiated to the defendant, and which had subsequently passed from the latter into the hands of third persons, by whom the judgments were obtained; held, that the injunction could not be decreed until their answers had come in, although the bill stated, and the defendant admitted, that he had paid the judgments, and was then the only person interested in them, because such statement and admission might be made by collusion.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of Virginia.

Carter Beverley, being indebted to the appellant, Horace Marshall, assigned to him several bills of exchange, amounting, in the aggregate, to £900 sterling, which had been drawn by the respondent, Peter R. Beverley, on Bird Beverley, of London, in favor of the said Carter Beverley. These bills were severally transferred, for valuable consideration, by the appellant, to Luke Tiernan & Co., Stewart Montgomery & Co., Jesse Eichelberger & Co., and Cornelius and John Comegys; and having been forwarded by them to London for payment, were protested for non-acceptance and non-payment, and so returned. Suits were instituted by these parties against Peter R. Beverley, on which he confessed judgments. Having been taken in execution and 314*] imprisoned, he gave bond for the prison bounds, which he broke. A second series of suits were brought on the prison bounds bonds, after judgments on which, he filed the present bill against Horace Marshall, Carter Beverley, Luke Tiernan & Co., Stewart Montgomery & Co., Jesse Eichelberger & Co., Cornelius and John Comegys, and John Brown, charging usury in the transactions between Carter Beverley and Horace Marshall, and a fraudulent sale of certain slaves of Carter Beverley, on which Horace Marshall retained a lien, as a collateral security for his debt; and charging, also, that although the suits were in the name of Luke Tiernan and others (to whom the bills had been transferred), they were, in fact, for the complainant's benefit, he having paid to his indorser what was due on those bills. On these grounds, a perpetual injunction was prayed for and awarded. The appellant, by his answer, admitted the last allegation, but denied the usury, and insisted that the sales of Carter Beverley's negroes had been made in strict conformity with the deed of trust under which they were sold. None of the other defendants answered the bill.

This cause was argued by the Attorney-General for the appellant, and by Mr. Jones and Mr. Taylor for the respondent.

Mr. Justice LIVINGSTON delivered the opinion of the court: This is an appeal from a decree in equity, of the Circuit Court for the District of Virginia,*to which the following objec-[*315 tions have been made:

1st. That there is a defect of parties. Although all the persons in interest are made defendants to the bill, yet none of them had appeared to it except the appellant, on whose answer, and the proofs in the cause, the decree was made.

2d. Another objection is, that there was competent relief at law against the usurious contract stated in the bill; but as no defense of this kind was there set up, a court of chancery ought not to have interfered, especially after judgment had been obtained on the bills, and even on the prison bounds bonds, which were taken on the execution which had issued on those judgments.

3d. It is also contended that there was no

The proper time to take objection for want of parties, is upon opening the pleadings, and before the merits are discussed; but it frequently happens that after a cause has been heard, the court feels compelled to let it stand over for the purpose of amendment. 1 *Barb. ch. usury in any of the contracts between the appellant and Carter Beverley, and that the sale of the negroes under the deed of trust was fair, and in strict pursuance of the authority vested in the trustee.

4th, and lastly. Admitting the usury, and a fraud in the sale, it is insisted that the respondent, being an entire stranger to these transactions, had no right to call the appellant to account, or to any relief as against him.

The court has had under its consideration all these objections; but will now give its opinion only on the first of them. We are all satisfied that when this decree was pronounced, the case was not prepared for a final hearing. The bills which had been drawn by P. R. Beverley, having passed by Marshall into the hands of third 316* persons, who had *obtained judgments on them, and it being a principal object of the suit to enjoin further proceedings on them, the parties in whose favor they were rendered, ought not only to have been made defendants but a perpetual injunction ought not to have been decreed until their answers were filed. It was not enough in their absence that the complainant should state, and the defendant admit, that the latter had paid these judgments, and was now the only person interested in them. This might be done by collusion, and although that may not be the case here, it is not the course of a court of equity to make a decree which is to operate directly upon the parties in interest, as the perpetual injunction does here, without affording them an opportunity of being heard. For this error, the decree must be reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings.

Decree reversed.

DECREE.—This cause came on to be heard on the transcript of the record of the Circuit Court for the District of Virginia, and was argued by counsel. On consideration whereof, it is the opinion of this court that the said Circuit Court erred in perpetually enjoining the proceedings on the judgments obtained against the respondent, Peter R. Beverley, and the appellant, Horace Marshall, because the bills of exchange, which had been drawn by the said Peter R. Beverley, had passed into the hands of third persons, by whom the said judgments had been obtained, and before the answers of such creditors, who had been made defendants 317* to said bill of complaint, had come *in. It is therefore decreed and ordered, that the decree of the said Circuit Court in this case be, and the same is hereby reversed and annulled. And it is further ordered, that the said cause be remanded to the said Circuit Court for further proceedings to be had herein according to law.

[CONSTITUTIONAL LAW.]

LOUGHBOROUGH v. BLAKE.

Congress has authority to impose a direct tax on the District of Columbia, in proportion to the census directed to be taken by the constitution.

The power of Congress to levy and collect taxes, duties, imposts and excises, is co-extensive with the territory of the United States.

The power of Congress to exercise exclusive jurisdiction in all cases whatsoever within the District of Columbia, includes the power of taxing it.

THIS case, which was an action of trespass brought in the Circuit Court for the District of Columbia, to try the right of Congress to impose a direct tax on that district, and in which the court below gave judgment for the defendant, was argued by Mr. Jones for the plaintiff, and by the Attorney-General for the defendant.

Mr. Chief Justice MARSHALL delivered the opinion of the court: This case presents to the consideration of the court a single question. It is this: *Has Congress a right to im- [*318] pose a direct tax on the District of Columbia?

The counsel who maintains the negative has contended, that Congress must be considered in two distinct characters. In one character as legislating for the states; in the other, as a local legislature for the district. In the latter character, it is admitted, the power of levying direct taxes may be exercised; but, it is contended, for district purposes only, in like manner as the legislature of a state may tax the people of a state for state purposes.

Without inquiring at present into the soundness of this distinction, its possible influence on the application in this district of the first article of the constitution, and of several of the amendments, may not be altogether unworthy of consideration. It will readily suggest itself to the gentlemen who press this argument, that those articles which, in general terms, restrain the power of Congress, may be applied to the laws enacted by that body for the district, if it be considered as governing the district in its character as the national legislature, with less difficulty than if it be considered a mere local legislature.

But we deem it unnecessary to pursue this investigation, because we think the right of Congress to tax the district does not depend solely on the grant of exclusive legislation.

The 8th section of the 1st article gives to Congress the "power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts and excises," for the purposes thereafter mentioned. This grant is general, without limitation as to place. It consequently extends to all *places over which [*319] the government extends. If this could be doubted, the doubt is removed by the subsequent words which modify the grant. These words are, "but all duties, imposts, and excises, shall be uniform throughout the United States." It will not be contended that the modification of the power extends to places to which the power itself does not extend. The power, then, to lay and collect duties, imposts, and excises, may be exercised, and must be exercised throughout the United States. Does this term designate the whole, or any particular portion of the American empire? Certainly this question can admit of but one answer. It is the name given to our great republic, which is composed of states and territories. The District of Columbia, or the territory west of the Missouri, is not less within the United States than Maryland or Pennsylvania; and it is not less necessary, on the principles of our constitution, that uniformity in the imposition of imposts, duties, and excises, should be observed in the one than in the other. Since, then, the power to lay and collect taxes, which includes direct taxes, is obviously co-extensive with the power to lay and collect duties, imposts and excises, and since the latter extends throughout the United States, it follows that the power to impose direct taxes also extends throughout the United States.

The extent of the grant being ascertained, how far is it abridged by any part of the constitution?

The 20th section of the first article declares, that "representatives and direct taxes shall be apportioned among the several states which 320* may be included *within this Union, according to their respective numbers."

The object of this regulation is, we think, to furnish a standard by which taxes are to be apportioned, not to exempt from their operation any part of our country. Had the intention been to exempt from taxation those who were not represented in Congress, that intention would have been expressed in direct terms. The power having been expressly granted, the exception would have been expressly made. But a limitation can scarcely be said to be insinuated. The words used do not mean that direct taxes shall be imposed on states only which are represented, or shall be apportioned to representatives; but that direct taxation, in its application to states, shall be apportioned to numbers. Representation is not made the foundation of taxation. If, under the enumeration of a representative for every 30,000 souls, one state had been found to contain 59,000, and another 60,000, the first would have been entitled to only one representative, and the last to two. Their taxes, however, would not have been as one to two, but as fifty-nine to sixty. This clause was obviously not intended to create any exemption from taxation, or to make taxation dependent on representation, but to furnish a standard for the apportionment of each on the states.

The 4th paragraph of the 9th section of the same article will next be considered. It is in these words: "No capitation, or other direct tax, shall be laid, unless in proportion to the census, or enumeration hereinbefore directed to be taken."

321* The census referred to is in that clause of the constitution which has just been considered, which makes numbers the standard by which both representatives and direct taxes shall be apportioned among the states. The actual enumeration is to be made "within three years after the first meeting of the Congress of the United States, and within every subsequent term of ten years, in such manner as they shall by law direct."

As the direct and declared object of this census is, to furnish a standard by which "representatives, and direct taxes, may be apportioned among the several states which may be included within this Union," it will be admitted that the omission to extend it to the district or the territories would not render it defective. The census referred to is admitted to be a census exhibiting the numbers of the respective states. It cannot, however, be admitted, that the argument which limits the application of the power of direct taxation to the population contained in this census is a just one. The language of the clause does not imply this restriction. It is not that "no capitation or other direct tax shall be laid, unless on those comprehended within the census hereinbefore directed to be taken," but "unless in proportion to" that census. Now, this proportion may be applied to the district or territories. If an enumeration be taken of the population in the district and territories, on the same principles on which the enumeration of the respective States is made, then the information is acquired by which a direct tax may be imposed on the district and territories, "in proportion to the *census or enumeration" which the [322 constitution directs to be taken.

The standard, then, by which direct taxes must be laid, is applicable to this district, and will enable Congress to apportion on it its just and equal share of the burthen, with the same accuracy as on the respective states. If the tax be laid in this proportion, it is within the very words of the restriction. It is a tax in proportion to the census or enumeration referred to.

But the argument is presented in another form, in which its refutation is more difficult. It is urged against this construction, that it would produce the necessity of extending direct taxation to the district and territories, which would not only be inconvenient, but contrary to the understanding and practice of the whole government. If the power of imposing direct taxes be co-extensive with the United States, then it is contended, that the restrictive clause, if applicable to the district and territories, requires that the tax should be extended to them, since to omit them would be to violate the rule of proportion.

We think a satisfactory answer to this argument may be drawn from a fair comparative view of the different clauses of the constitution which have been recited.

That the general grant of power to lay and collect taxes is made in terms which comprehend the district and territories as well as the states, is, we think, incontrovertible. The subsequent clauses are intended to regulate the exercise of this power, not to withdraw from it any portion of the community. *The [323 words in which those clauses are expressed import this intention. In thus regulating its exercise, a rule is given in the 2d section of the first article for its application to the respective states. That rule declares how direct taxes upon the states shall be imposed. They shall be apportioned upon the several states according to their numbers. If, then, a direct tax be laid at all, it must be laid on every state, conformably to the rule provided in the constitution. Congress has clearly no power to exempt any state from its due share of the burden. But this regulation is expressly confined to the states, and creates no necessity for extending the tax to the district or territories. The words of the 9th section do not in terms require that the system of direct taxation, when resorted to, shall be extended to the territories, as the words of the 2d section require that it shall be extended to all the states. They, therefore, may, without violence, be understood to give a rule when the territories shall be taxed, without imposing the necessity of taxing them. It could scarcely escape the members of the convention that the expense of executing the law in a territory might exceed the amount of the tax. But be this as it may, the doubt created by the words of the 9th section relates to the obligation to apportion a direct tax on the territories as well as the states, rather than to the power to do so.

If, then, the language of the constitution be construed to comprehend the territories and District of Columbia, as well as the states, that language confers on Congress the power of 324* taxing the district *and territories as well as the states. If the general language of the constitution should be confined to the states, still the 16th paragraph of the 8th section gives to Congress the power of exercising "exclusive legislation in all cases whatsoever within this district."

On the extent of these terms, according to the common understanding of mankind, there can be no difference of opinion; but it is contended that they must be limited by that great principle which was asserted in our revolution—that representation is inseparable from taxation.

The difference between requiring a continent, with an immense population, to submit to be taxed by a government having no common interest with it, separated from it by a vast ocean, restrained by no principle of apportionment, and associated with it by no common feelings; and permitting the representatives of the American people, under the restrictions of our constitution, to tax a part of the society, which is either in a state of infancy advancing to manhood, looking forward to complete equality so soon as that state of manhood shall be attained, as is the case with the territories; or which has voluntarily relinquished the right of representation, and has adopted the whole body of Congress for its legitimate government, as is the case with the district, is too obvious not to present itself to the minds of all. Although in theory it might be more congenial to the spirit of our institutions to admit a representative from the district, it may be doubted whether, in fact, its interests would be rendered thereby 325* *the more secure; and certainly the constitution does not consider their want of a representative in Congress as exempting it from equal taxation.

If it were true that, according to the spirit of our constitution, the power of taxation must be limited by the right of representation, whence is derived the right to lay and collect duties, imposts and excises, within this district? If the principles of liberty, and of our constitution, forbid the raising of revenue from those who are not represented, do not these principles forbid the raising it by duties, imposts, and excises, as well as by a direct tax? If the principles of our revolution give a rule applicable to this case, we cannot have forgotten that neither the stamp act nor the duty on tea were direct taxes.

Yet it is admitted that the constitution not only allows, but enjoins the government to extend the ordinary revenue system to this district.

If it be said that the principle of uniformity, established in the constitution, secures the district from oppression in the imposition of indirect taxes, it is not less true that the principle of apportionment, also established in the constitution, secures the district from any oppressive exercise of the power to lay and collect direct taxes.

After giving this subject its serious attention, the court is unanimously of opinion that Congress possesses, under the constitution, the power to lay and collect direct taxes within the District of Columbia, in proportion to the census directed to be taken by the constitution, and that there is no error in the judgment of the Circuit Court.

THE BANK OF COLUMBIA.

The 17th section of the act incorporating the Mechanics' Bank of Alexandria, providing "that all bills, bonds, notes, and every other contract or engagement on behalf of the corporation, shall be signed by the president, and countersigned by the cashier; and the funds of the corporation shall in no case be liable for any contract or engagement, unless the same shall be signed and countersigned as aforesaid," does not extend to contracts and undertakings implied in law.

Where a check was drawn by a person who was the cashier of an incorporated bank, and it appeared doubtful upon the face of the instrument whether it was an official or a private act, parol evidence was admitted to show that it was an official act.

The acts of agents do not derive their validity from professing on the face of them to have been done in the exercise of their agency.

The liability of the principal depends upon the facts. 1st. That the act was done in the exercise, and 2d. Within the limits of the power delegated.

In ascertaining these facts, as connected with the execution of any written instrument, parol testimony is admissible.

In the United States it is well settled that the acts of a corporation evidenced by vote, written or unwritten, are as completely binding upon it, and are as complete authority to its agents as the most solemn acts done under the corporate seal; that it may as well be bound by express promises through its authorized agents as by deed; and that promises might as well be implied from its acts and the acts of its agents as if it had been an individual. *Railway Co. v. WM. PATON, Jr.

This check was offered in evidence by the plaintiff below, and testimony to prove that the said Paton, before, at the time, and subsequent to the drawing of the said check, was cashier of the said Mechanics' Bank, and the said Minor, the teller thereof; and in order to prove that the said check was drawn by the said William Paton in his capacity as cashier, and was so understood by him, and so understood by the said Bank of Columbia, their officers and servants; evidence was further offered to prove, that from the 5th of May, 1817, to the time of drawing the said check, there was kept in the said Mechanics' Bank, by the proper officer thereof, a book of printed checks in blank, for the purpose of being used by the cashier, in drawing his official checks; and that the check in question had been cut out of the said book. That the said cashier, in his official character, had frequently used the blank checks out of the said book, in drawing upon other banks in the district, and there was no other difference between the checks so drawn and the check in question, other than the letters "Cas." or "Ca." being superadded to the name of the said William Paton, Jun., in the checks 328*] *so drawn upon the said other banks. That although the said check-book was intended for the use of the bank, the checks in the same were sometimes used for other purposes; that the business of the said banks was sometimes managed through the medium of letters; and in such official correspondence, it was usual to subscribe the names of the cashiers, with the addition of some letters denoting their capacity of cashier; but such form was sometimes omitted, and was in no case deemed indispensable, when, from other circumstances, such correspondence appeared to be official. The plaintiffs further offered in evidence two letters of the said William Paton, directed to William Whann, cashier of the Bank of Columbia, each signed with the proper name of the said William Paton, without the addition of cashier, or the letters "Cas." or "Ca.," one of which letters related to the private concerns of the said William Whann, and the other to the concerns of the bank.

Evidence was further offered to prove that the check given in evidence as aforesaid, was (together with a number of other checks, drawn by the said William Paton upon other banks, with the addition in his signature of the letters "Ca." and "Cas." and cut out of the official check-book) sent by the said Paton, on the 12th of July, 1817, by the hands of the said Philip H. Minor, then being teller as aforesaid, to Richard Smith, cashier of the office of discount and deposit of the Bank of the United States at Washington, to be paid in liquidation of a balance due from the said Mechanics' Bank to the said office of discount and deposit. That the said letter was *delivered by [*329 the said Minor to the said Smith, and the checks and moneys contained in the same were applied to the credit of said Mechanics' Bank. That among the checks so sent, was one for $17,626.05, written upon, and cut out of the check-book aforesaid, and in the words and figures following, to wit:

Mechanics' Bank of Alexandria, July 12, 1817.

No. 32.

Cashier of the Branch Bank of the United States, Washington—Pay to the order of Philip H. Minor, amount of discount made me, which I believe is seventeen thousand, six hundred and twenty-six dollars and five cents.

WM. PATON, Jun.

That the said Richard Smith, about the 17th of July, 1817, did cause the same to be presented to the Bank of Columbia for payment, and the same was accordingly paid, and was thereupon immediately charged to the said Mechanics' Bank.

Evidence was further offered to prove that the said Richard Smith considered the said check as the official check of the said William Paton, and it was so paid by him; and that the cashier of the Bank of Columbia also considered it as the official check of the said Paton, and it was so paid by him.

Evidence was further offered, on the part of the Mechanics' Bank, to prove that the said William Paton, at the time he drew the said check, declared it was his private individual 330* check; that he had *funds in the Bank of Columbia to meet it, and that it was passed by him to the said Mechanics' Bank as the individual check of the said William Paton. And evidence was further offered to prove that the Mechanics' Bank paid to the said Paton the amount of the said check.

Upon the evidence thus offered by the plaintiffs below, the counsel for the defendants objected to the whole of the said evidence, and insisted, that if the said check for $10,000 could be used as evidence against the said Mechanics' Bank, that the character of the said check could only be decided by the check itself, and that no parol or other testimony could be received to explain the same, and objected to the testimony offered upon that ground. But the court overruled the objection, and gave it as their opinion to the jury, that the said check was, in connection with the other evidence, proper and competent evidence in this case against the said Mechanics' Bank, and that it was competent to explain the character of the said check; or, in other words, to prove, by parol or other testimony, that the said check was drawn under such circumstances, and in such a manner, as justified the plaintiffs in considering it as an official check, and paying it as such, and charging the same to the debit of the defendants. And the evidence offered as aforesaid, with said check, was admitted by the court, and given in evidence to the jury.

The defendants below then prayed the opinion of the court, and their instruction to the jury, that the check for $10,000, produced in 331* evidence *by the plaintiffs, is, on the face of it, a private, and not an official check, and of itself cannot, in law, charge the Mechanics' Bank with the payment of the said $10,000; and that the said William Paton was liable in his individual character for the payment of the same. Which opinion the court refused to give.

They also prayed the court to instruct the jury, that the check aforesaid was, upon the face of it, prima facie evidence of its being the private individual check of the said William Paton, and the possession of the said check by the said Mechanics' Bank, if proved to be in their possession, was prima facie evidence that they had paid a value for it; and, that unless the Bank of Columbia should satisfy the jury by other evidence than the said check, that it was an official check of the cashier of the said bank, that the jury should find their verdict for the defendants. Which instruction the court refused to give.

The defendants below also prayed the court to instruct the jury, that if they should be of opinion that the check was drawn by the said William Paton as his individual check and was received by the said Mechanics' Bank, as the individual check of the said William Paton, and that the Bank paid to the said Paton the full amount of the said check, that then the said bank having received the amount thereof from the bank of the United States as aforesaid, would have a right to retain the amount of the said check as against the said Bank of Columbia, notwithstanding the said Bank of Columbia may have been under an impression that it was the official check *of the said William Paton. [332 Which instruction the court refused to give.

A bill of exceptions was filed, and a verdict and judgment thereon having been rendered for the plaintiff, the cause was brought by writ of error to this court.

Mr. Swann and Mr. Lee, for the plaintiffs in error, argued: 1. That parol evidence to prove the character or capacity in which the check was drawn was clearly inadmissible. The check bears, on the face of it, all the qualities of a bill of exchange. It binds the drawer in his individual capacity. When it is competent for a party to bind himself individually, parol evidence cannot be introduced to show that what he has in fact done in his own name was intended to be done as an agent for others.<sup>1</sup> If one of several partners promise individually to pay a debt, he will not be permitted to show that it was due jointly from himself and his partners.<sup>2</sup> And, generally, all parol evidence to contradict, or vary, a written instrument, is inadmissible.<sup>3</sup> The object of the testimony in the present case, is not to show that the drawer is liable to a greater or less extent than that expressed on the face of the check, but to make a corporation, whose servant he was, liable for a debt which, according to the face of the instrument, is a private debt. For if the check, on the *face of it, was an official one, the [333 evidence was unnecessary; and introducing it is an admission that the instrument itself was not sufficient to bind the corporation. 2. The evidence of the debt being a written instrument, the construction of it is matter of law for the decision of the court, and the court ought to have instructed the jury that the check was, on the face of it, a private, and not an official check, and could not bind the Mechanics' Bank. 3. But at all events the check was prima facie evidence of its being the private check of the drawer, and the possession of it by the plaintiffs in error was also prima facie evidence of their having paid a valuable consideration for it. 4. Again, this action cannot be maintained, because the contract upon which it is brought was not made in conformity with the character of the Mechanics' Bank, which provides (s. 17) "that all bills, bonds, notes, and every other contract or engagement on behalf of the corporation, shall be signed by the president, and countersigned by the cashier; and the corporation shall in no case be liable for any contract or engagement, unless the same shall be signed and countersigned as aforesaid.

Mr. Jones and Mr. Key, contra, insisted: 1. That the check, upon the face of it, did not purport to be the private check of Paton, but the check of the bank, drawn by him as its cashier, and that the presumption was, that it was an official act. 2. But supposing it to be equivocal on the face of the instrument, whether he acted in his official or private capacity, extrinsic parol evidence, to show in what capacity he acted, was admissible. This would not 334*] be evidence to contradict the written instrument, but only to explain it.<sup>1</sup> Suppose the Bank of Columbia had sued Paton, the date and entire face of the check would have been sufficient to defeat their action. There was enough to raise a presumption that he acted officially, because the act was within the scope of his authority. No rule of law obliged him to add to his name any designation of his official character; and even supposing him to be liable in his individual capacity, it does not follow that his principles are not liable for what he has done, the presumption being strongly in favor of the official character of the act. And if it be doubtful whether he is personally liable to the Bank of Columbia, he is certainly liable to the Mechanics' Bank, whose servant he was; who had the best means of knowing and correcting the fraud or mistake; and who, upon the principle of the rule de damno evitando, ought to bear the loss. 3. As to the law incorporating the Mechanics' Bank, it has no application to this case, unless it be contended that it would extend to the case of a deposit, and every other case where the law implies a contract. The action is not brought upon any such express undertaking as the act contemplates must be signed by the President, &c.; but upon an undertaking which the law implies, and which it may as well imply in the case of a corporation as of an individual.

Mr. Justice JOHNSON delivered the opinion of the court: The merits of this case lie within a very limited compass. The question is, 335*] whether a certain act, done by the cashier of a bank, was done in his official or individual capacity. Had the draft, signed by Paton, borne no marks of an official character on the face of it, the case would have presented more difficulty. But if marks of an official character not only exist on the face, but predominate, the case is really a very familiar one. Evidence to fix its true character becomes indispensable.

It has been contended—but the argument was not pressed with much confidence—that this defendant could not be bound otherwise than in conformity with the 17th section of the charter; by which it is enacted, “that all bills, bonds, notes, and every other contract or engagement, on behalf of the corporation, shall be signed by the president, and countersigned by the cashier; and the funds of the corporation shall in no case be liable for any contract or engagement, unless the same shall be signed and countersigned as aforesaid.”

It is to be hoped this argument was not intended to reach the case of a deposit of money; and yet if it proves anything, it proves that no contract in law could be imputed to this bank. The truth is, that a check is properly neither a bond, bill, or note, with regard to the bank drawn upon, but an acquittance. And the contract arising out of a payment upon it, is a contract for money advanced, and must be so declared upon. It is true that checks are generally made payable to bearer, and this was made payable to order; but it is in evidence that it was drawn as a check, and paid as a check, and the declaration contains only the common money counts.

Of the six exceptions in the transcript of the *record, the 1st, 2d, 4th and 5th are [*336 taken on behalf of the Mechanics' Bank of Alexandria. Upon comparing these exceptions with the evidence, it does not appear that they affirm any other proposition growing out of that evidence, but that the check, on the face of it, purported to be the private check of Paton, and no extrinsic evidence could be received to prove the contrary.

The only ground on which it can be contended that this check was a private check, is, that it had not below the name the letters Cas. or Ca. But the fallacy of the proposition will at once appear, from the consideration, that the consequence would be, that all Paton's checks must have been adjudged private. For no definite meaning could be attached to the addition of those letters without the aid of parol testimony.

But the fact that this appeared on its face to be a private check, is by no means to be conceded. On the contrary, the appearance of the corporate name of the institution on the face of the paper at once leads to the belief that it is a corporate, and not an individual transaction; to which must be added the circumstances, that the cashier is the drawer, and the teller the payee; and the form of ordinary checks deviated from by the substitution of to order, for to bearer. The evidence, therefore, on the face of the bill, predominates in favor of its being a bank transaction. Applying, then, the plaintiff's own principle to the case, and the restriction as to the production of parol or extrinsic evidence could have been only applicable to himself. But it is enough for the purposes of the defendant to establish, that there existed, *on the face of the paper, circum- [*337 stances from which it might reasonably be inferred that it was either one or the other. In that case, it became indispensable to resort to extrinsic evidence, to remove the doubt. The evidence resorted to for this purpose was the most obvious and reasonable possible, viz., that this was the appropriate form of an official check; that it was, in fact, cut out of the official check-book of the bank, and noted on the margin; that the money was drawn in behalf of, and applied to the use of the Mechanics' Bank; and by all the banks, and all the officers of the banks through which it passed, recognized as an official transaction. It is true, it was in evidence that this check was credited to Paton's own account, on the books of his bank; but it was done by his own order, and with the evidence before their eyes that it was officially drawn. This would never have been sanctioned by the directors, unless for reasons which they best understood, and on account of debits which they only could explain.

It is by no means true, as was contended in argument, that the acts of agents derive their validity from professing, on the face of them, to have been done in the exercise of their agency. In the more solemn exercise of derivative powers, as applied to the execution of instruments known to the common law, rules of form have been prescribed. But in the diversified exercise of the duties of a general agent, the liability of the principal depends upon the facts: 1. That the act was done in the exercise, and, 2. Within the limits of the powers delegated. These 338* facts are necessarily inquirable into by a court and jury; and this inquiry is not confined to written instruments (to which alone the principle contended for could apply), but to any act with, or without writing, within the scope of the power or confidence reposed in the agent; as, for instance, in the case of money credited in the books of a teller, or proved to have been deposited with him, though he omits to credit it.

[PRIZE AND INSTANCE COURT.]

THE JOSEFA SEGUNDA.

CARRICABURA ET AL., Claimants.

An information under the act of the 3d of March, 1807, c. 77, to prevent the importation of slaves into the United States. The alleged unlawful importation attempted to be excused upon the plea of distress. Excuse repelled and condemnation pronounced.

Upon a piratical capture, the property of the original owners cannot be forfeited for the misconduct of the captors in violating the municipal laws of the country where the vessel seized by them is carried.

But where the capture is made by a regularly commissioned captor, he acquires a title to the captured property, which can only be divested by recapture, or by the sentence of a competent tribunal of his own country; and the property is subject to forfeiture for a violation, by the captor, of the revenue or other municipal laws of the neutral country into which the prize may be carried.

APPPEAL from the District Court of Louisiana. From the proceedings in the court 339* below, it appeared *that the brig Josefa Segunda being Spanish property, and on a voyage from the coast of Africa to the Island of Cuba, with a cargo of negroes, was captured on the 11th day of February, 1818, off Cape Tiberon in St. Domingo, by the Venezuelan privateer, the General Arismendi. On the 24th of April following she was seized in the river Mississippi, by certain custom-house officers, and conducted to New Orleans, where a libel was filed against her in the District Court for the Louisiana district.

The libel contained four counts. The first alleged that the said negroes were unlawfully brought into the United States from some foreign country in the said brig, with intent to hold, sell, or dispose of them as slaves, or with intent that the same should be held to service or labor contrary to the act of Congress in such case made and provided..

The second count alleged that these negroes were taken, received and transported on board the said brig, from some of the coasts or kingdoms of Africa, or from some other foreign kingdom, place or country, for the purpose of selling them in some port or place within the jurisdiction of the United States, as slaves, or to be held to service or labor contrary, &c. In the third count it was charged that the said brig was found in some river, port, bay or harbor of the United States, or on the high seas, within the jurisdictional limits of the United States, or hovering on the coast thereof, to wit, in the river Mississippi, having on board some negroes, mulattoes, or people of color, for the purpose of selling them as slaves, or with an intent to land the same, in some port or place within the jurisdiction of the [*340] United States, contrary, &c. The fourth allegation or count was, that one hundred and seventy-five persons of color, not being native citizens, or registered seamen of the United States, or natives of countries beyond the Cape of Good Hope, were landed from said brig, in a port or place, situate in a state which, by law, had prohibited the admission or importation as aforesaid, to wit, at or near the Balize in the state of Louisiana, contrary, &c.

This libel was filed on the 29th of April, 1818, and on the 5th of May following a claim was interposed by Messrs. Carricabura, Arieta & Co., merchants of the Havanna, which stated that they were owners of the said brig, which, with the said negro slaves, was, on the high seas, while pursuing a lawful voyage, captured and taken from them by a certain Rene Beluche, and the crew of the armed ship or vessel called the General Arismendi, sailing under the flag of the revolted colonies of Venezuela and New Grenada; that the said brig put into the Balize in very great distress, and without any intention on the part of the crew, or any other person on board, to infringe or violate any law of the United States. That whatever may have been the conduct of the prize crew, or of any other persons on board, the claimants insist that they cannot be made responsible for any of their acts, because the said brig, with her cargo, was taken from their possession unlawfully, and in violation of the law of nations, inasmuch as the captors had no legal authority to take the same; and if they had any commission, the capture *was illegal, be- [*341] cause the privateer, the General Arismendi, was armed and fitted out, or her armament or equipment increased, in a port of the United States, in violation of the laws thereof.

On this libel and claim, it appeared in evidence that the capture of the brig Josefa Segunda, with a cargo of slaves, was made off Cape Tiberon, in the Island of St. Domingo, on the 11th of February, 1818, on a voyage to the Havanna, from the coast of Africa, which she had left in the preceding month of December or January. The capture was made by a Venezuelan brig, the General Arismendi. This vessel was commissioned as a privateer by John Baptista Arismendi, who styled himself Commander-General of Venezuela, and Captain-General of the Island of Marguerita. The caption of the commission was, "Republic of Venezuela;" and it purported to have been given in the Island of Marguerita, the 1st of February, in the year 1818, and to be sealed with the great seal of the state. At the time of capture, there were from two to three hundred slaves on board; some of these, but what number does not appear, afterwards died; others, but how many is not stated, were sold at the Jardins de la Reine, on the south side of the Island of Cuba, in order to purchase provisions. Toward the end of the month of February, the prize-master of the brig received written orders from the captain of the privateer to conduct the prize to the Island of Marguerita; and always steered, as he says, eastward, the winds being always ahead. The prize-master had no log-book on board; he wrote every day's occurrences on *a slate, effacing what had been written the day before. On the 18th of April, 1818, in the morning, the brig was boarded by a pilot, about forty miles from the Balize, and arrived there about 4 o'clock p. m. About twenty-five miles from the Balize, the brig fell in with the American ship Balize, from which no provisions were asked, but from whom he received six bags of rice. On the 24th of April, the brig was seized by the custom-house officers, and conducted to New Orleans. On the 27th of April, 1818, Laporte, who was the agent of Beluche at New Orleans, wrote a letter to the prize-master of the brig, containing, among others, these expressions: "Maintain always your declaration of being forced into port." "Take care that your sailors neither say nor do anything which may prejudice the interest of Venezuela." The privateer, after the capture of the brig, went to Jamaica for provisions. The pilot who first boarded the brig stated that her mainmast was sprung, her ropes were all bad, the sails not fit to go to sea; that they were pumping the last cask of water on board. Her spars were middling, except the mainmast; there were no provisions on board; the men were in a state of starvation; that the slaves had nothing but skin upon their bones. A witness, who was on board in her passage up the river, stated that the brig sailed equal to anything in the river; that he would not be afraid to make a voyage in her; her tackle, ropes, &c., were as good as usual; she was pumped out but once while he was on board; they carried topsails coming up; the spars were generally good. He saw nothing in the appearance of *the crew of their having been starved. It also appeared that the agent of the claimants in New Orleans received letters from the owners of the brig sometime prior to her arrival at New Orleans, and that one of the owners had arrived in that city while this cause was depending, and before the 19th of June, 1818.

It was admitted by the claimant that there existed an understanding between them and the captors; that the former were to render to the latter a compensation for their not interposing any claim, which was so far ascertained that the sum which the captors were to receive was not to be less than six, nor more than eight thousand dollars, to depend on the expense and trouble incident to the prosecution, and the repairing of the vessel; that this arrangement was made by the advice of the captor's counsel, from a conviction on his part that they could not recover on account, as he conceived, of the illegality of the commission. It was also admitted, that the claimants were the original owners of the brig and slaves on board.

On this testimony, the District Court condemned the brig, and effects found on board, to the United States, and the cause was brought by appeal to this court.

Mr. C. J. Ingersoll, for the appellants and claimants, argued: 1. That the vessel was compelled by necessity to enter the Mississippi, and, therefore, was not liable to forfeiture under the acts of Congress for suppressing the slave trade. 2. That the commission *of [*344 General Arismendi, under which the original capture was made, was unlawful, he having no authority to issue it as Governor of the Island of Marguerita, a dependent province of the new state of Venezuela. The owners were, therefore, entitled to restitution under the 9th article of the Spanish treaty of 1795, as well as under the general law of nations; the right of property not being changed by a piratical seizure.<sup>1</sup> 3. But supposing it to have been a regular capture in the exercise of the rights of war, and supposing the captors to have entered the waters of the United States with the intention of violating the acts of Congress, it is insisted, that the prize thus carried into a neutral port, before adjudication, cannot be forfeited to the neutral state for a breach of its municipal laws, committed by the captors, without the consent or collusion of the original owners. It has been repeatedly determined, that when captures are made in violation of our neutral rights, as ascertained by the law of nations, the acts of Congress, and treaties with foreign powers, restitution of the captured property will be decreed by our tribunals to the original owners.<sup>2</sup> Why? Because it is the right as well as duty of the nation to prevent its neutral territory and resources from being used for the purposes of hostility by either belligerent. It will, therefore, restore in two cases: *First, where [*345 the capture is made within its territorial limits, and, secondly, when made by a vessel armed or re-equipped in its ports. The same principles apply where the captor violates the laws of police or the revenue laws of the neutral state. The infringement of the one is as injurious to that state, and to the captured belligerent, as the infringement of the other. The injury to the original owner is equally great, whether the privateer was fitted in the neutral ports or is permitted to carry his prizes into those ports for sale. The spes recuperandi is gone; and will the neutral sovereign condescend to avail himself, as against an innocent friend, of the forfeiture incurred by the misconduct of the enemy of the latter? The captor cannot sell; he cannot completely divest the original owner of his remaining right to the captured property before its lawful condemnation; shall he then be permitted to do so by smuggling, or even by attempting, or barely intending to smuggle it in a neutral port? It is the well-established doctrine of public law that belligerents have no right to sell or dispose of their prizes in a neutral port, before they are judicially condemned in a competent court of the captor's country; unless in case of necessity, or when the right is secured to them by treaty, or by the express permission of the neutral government; or in case of the intervention of peace.<sup>1</sup> 346* If, then, the captor has not such an *interest in his uncondemned prize as will enable him to dispose of it by sale to another, how can he be said to have such an interest as will enable him to forfeit it to the neutral state for a breach of its municipal laws? This is a novel question, both here and in the European courts of prize. It indeed settled that the prize court may dismiss the claim of a citizen, violating the law of his own country where the court sits; or of an ally or neutral violating the treaties between his own country and that of the court; and that it may dismiss the libel of a captor (of the country where the court sits), for a collusive capture, or for a violation of the laws of trade. But the moment the neutral court, in the present case, ascertained that this was a capture jure belli, or piratical, it had nothing to do but to restore it to the original possessor. The captor had not such a proprietary interest as rendered him capable of forfeiting it to the United States. The first case of a forfeiture in the prize court for a breach of municipal law, which is reported, is that of The Walsingham Packet.<sup>2</sup> That was the case of a British packet, retaken from the enemy, wherein a claim was given for the cargo as the property of British and Portuguese merchants, and resisted on the part of the captors, on the ground that such trade was prohibited by act of Parliament. 347* Here the jurisdiction of the *court, with respect to the thing recaptured, was unquestionable; and Sir W. Scott rejected the claim on account of the claimant's own personal misconduct, reserving the ultimate question to whom the property should be condemned. In the case of The Etrusco,<sup>3</sup> it was subsequently determined that condemnation in such cases should be, not to the captors, but to the crown. In the case of The Recovery,<sup>4</sup> Sir W. Scott determined that the claim of a neutral could not be rejected in a prize court of the captor's country, for violating the municipal law of that country. Why? Because, as to him, it was a mere court of the law of nations, though as to British subjects it was also a court of municipal law. As to him, the offense was merely malum prohibitum; as to British subjects, it was malum in se; and they had no right to complain if they were punished for it in any tribunal of their own country, however constituted. The cases of The Bothnea and The Jahnstaff,<sup>5</sup> and of The George,<sup>6</sup> in this court, were also cases where the court had undoubted prize jurisdiction, and the original owner, being an enemy, could interpose no claim. The captor had been guilty of collusion with the public enemy, and had assisted him in violating the non-importation act. The court, therefore, dismissed his libel and condemned the property of the United *States. [348 A similar observation is applicable to the case of The Venus,<sup>7</sup> in which the joint claim of a citizen and an alien to the vessel was rejected, on the ground that the former had made a false oath, in order to obtain a register, whereby she became liable to forfeiture under the registry act. The District Court of Louisiana, beside its circuit court powers, may exercise jurisdiction as a prize court, or an instance court of admiralty. In neither of these capacities could it take cognizance of the present case. Not as a prize court: for the jurisdiction belonged exclusively to the Venezuelan tribunals. Nor as an instance court of the law of nations: since, as such, its decree could only be for restitution to the captors or to the original owners, according as our neutrality had or had not been violated. Nor as an instance court of municipal law, could it condemn the captured property of a friend before it had been declared good prize by a competent prize tribunal; unless, perhaps, where the owner or his agent had subjected his property to such a forfeiture by an offense against the municipal law, consummated before the capture. The proper course of proceeding, where there is no collusion between the captor and the former owner, is to punish those captors who attempt to violate our municipal laws in the same manner as those who violate our neutrality; that is, by disposing of them of their prizes, and restoring them to the original proprietors. Such was the conduct of Holland on a similar occasion, as *stated by Bynkershoek.<sup>8</sup> It is true [349 that he animadverts upon these ordinances of the states general; but his reflections will be found to be solely applicable to his own favorite notion of the right of belligerents to carry their prizes into neutral ports, and to *sell [350 them there, which has long since been ex-

8.—The passage of Bynkershoek here alluded to is as follows: He begins by observing: "Although it be lawful, on national principles, to carry a prize into neutral territory, and there to sell it, if the captor thinks proper, laws have, nevertheless, more than once been made to the contrary." He then proceeds: "The states general, on the 9th of August, 1658, issued an edict, by which they ordered, that no foreign captor who might be compelled by stress of weather, or some other reasonable cause, to bring his prize into the ports of this country, should presume to sell any part of it, or even to break bulk; but that he should inform the bailiff of the place of his arrival, who, having placed a guard on board of the ship, should keep a strict watch over her, until her departure: inflicting, moreover, a discretionary penalty, and a fine of one thousand florins, on any one that should assist in unloading, or purchase anything out of her. To which edict, the said states general, on the 7th of November, in the same year enacted a supplement, by which it was ordered, that no prize ship should be brought into the port itself, but merely into the outer roads, where she might be sheltered from danger, and that nothing should be unladen or sold out of her; and if anyone should act to the contrary, the prize should be restored to the former owner, as though it had never been taken, and the captor himself should be detained, and his own vessel seized and confiscated. The remainder of the edict merely confirms that of the 9th of August above mentioned. Whether those edicts were extorted from the states general by fear, or by any other cause, I do not know; but lest they should hereafter militate against national principles, we must declare that we rather believe them to have been temporary than perpetual laws." ploded. The force of this historical example is not diminished by his criticism, founded, as it is, upon a false theory. In the case now before the court, there can be no objection to restitution, on the ground of the traffic in which the original owners were engaged being prohibited by the laws of their own country; for it is notorious that Spain tolerates the trade. The principle, therefore, applied by the Lords of Appeal in England to an American slave-trader, in the case of The Amedie,<sup>1</sup> does not apply to this case. And Sir William Scott, since the determination of the lords, has decided, in the case of a Swedish vessel, that he would not condemn, because there was no positive proof that Sweden had prohibited the trade, although it did not appear that this state had ever sanctioned it, or that her subjects had been in the habit of carrying it on.<sup>2</sup> If it be said that the condemnation rests on the act of Congress, and that this act is general in its terms, and makes no distinction as to the manner in which vessels violating the law may have been brought into our waters, it is answered, that, like all other penal laws, it must receive an equitable and liberal construction, and cannot be applied to cases of distress, or other cases of vis major.

The Attorney-General, contra, argued principally upon the facts, to show that the capture was collusive, *and that, consequently, the court had jurisdiction to condemn the property to the United States, in a case where the captor and captured had combined in a scheme of fraud to defeat the execution of our municipal laws. He insisted, that even if this were not the fact, that the captors had by possession, jure belli, such a title to the property as rendered it liable to confiscation for any breach of our laws by the captors. Their title could only be divested by recapture, or by the sentence of a competent prize court of their own country; and how improbable it was that such court would dispossess them of it, is shown by the proofs and the pleadings in this cause, by which it appears that the property was Spanish, and, therefore, liable to condemnation in the prize courts of Venezuela. The establishment of a contrary doctrine by the court would furnish an effectual recipe by which all our laws of trade might be violated with impunity, since it would be extremely difficult in many cases to show that the capture was collusive, and in case of detection in the attempt to smuggle, the claimant would have nothing to do but to throw the blame upon the pretended captor, whilst, in case of success, he would reap the fruits which might attend it. However ingeniously contrived such a scheme might be, it was the duty of the court to penetrate through it, and when detected, to visit it with the penalty of confiscation.

Mr. Justice LIVINGSTON delivered the opinion of the court, and after stating the facts, proceeded as follows: The third count of the libel 352* is the only one *that has any bearing on the present case. It alleges a violation of the seventh section of an act of Congress prohibiting the importation of slaves into the United States, after the first day of January, in the year 1808, and which passed the 3d of March, 1807.

By this section it is enacted, "That if any ship or vessel shall be found, from and after the first day of January, 1808, in any river, port, bay, or harbor, or on the high seas, within the jurisdictional limits of the United States, or hovering on the coast thereof, having on board any negro, mulatto, or person of color, for the purpose of selling them as slaves, or with intent to land the same in any port or place within the jurisdiction of the United States, contrary to the prohibition of this act, every such ship or vessel, together with her tackle, apparel and furniture, and the goods or effects which shall be found on board the same, shall be forfeited to the use of the United States, and may be seized, prosecuted and condemned, in any court of the United States having jurisdiction thereof. And the proceeds of all such ships and vessels, their tackle, apparel and furniture, and the goods and effects on board of them, which shall be so seized, prosecuted, and condemned, shall be divided equally between the United States and the officers and men who shall make such seizure, or bring the same into port for condemnation, and the same shall be distributed in like manner as is provided by law for the distribution of prizes taken from an enemy; provided that the officers and men are entitled to one-half of the proceeds aforesaid, *shall safe-keep every negro, [353 mulatto, or person of color, found on board of any ship or vessel so seized by them, and deliver them to such persons as shall be appointed by the respective states to receive the same," &c.

It is not denied that the brig Josefa Segunda, shortly before her seizure, had been hovering on the coast of the United States, having on board a large number of persons of the description of those whose importation into this country is prohibited by the act; nor can there be any doubt, from the situation and circumstances under which she was found, and the manner in which she came within the jurisdictional limits of the United States, which appears to have been a voluntary act on the part of the prize-master, that there is at least prima facie evidence of an intention to dispose of these people as slaves, or to land them in some port or place within the jurisdiction of the United States.

The claimants, aware of the necessity of accounting for circumstances, which, unexplained, could not but prove fatal to their interests, contend, in the first place, that the coming into the Mississippi was a matter of necessity, produced by the perilous situation of the vessel, and the famishing condition of the people on board; and that, therefore, neither she nor her cargo can be obnoxious to the provisions of the act of Congress. If the claim be not sustained on this plea, it is insisted,

In the next place, that the capture being illegal or piratical, the original owners cannot be affected by any of the acts of the prize crew; and,

*In the third place, it is asserted, that [354 the vessel having been ransomed, and taken out of the hands of the captors, the claimants are restored to all their original rights, unimpaired by any acts on the part of the former.

Each of these claims for restitution will now be examined.

When any act is done, which of itself, and unexplained, is a violation of law, and a party to extricate himself, or his property, from the consequences of it, resorts to the plea of necessity or distress, the burden of proof is not only thrown upon him; but when the temptation to infringe the law is great, and the alleged necessity, if real, can be fully and easily established, no court should be satisfied with anything short of the most convincing and conclusive testimony. The proofs before us are so far from being of this character, that we look in vain for testimony of any serious disaster having befallen this vessel in her voyage from the Island of Cuba, to the Mississippi, or for a calamity of any kind, which might not have been averted or prevented, had the master seriously and honestly endeavored to reach the Island of Marguerita, which is now pretended to have been her real port of destination. That neither he nor his employer should have any great solicitude for the arrival of the prize at Marguerita, is easily accounted for, when it is recollected that this island, as well from its small extent, being not more than forty miles in length, and perhaps not more than half as broad, as from the scantiness and poverty of its population, could afford but a wretched, if 355* any market at all for slaves; while at New Orleans, each of them would produce the extravagant and tempting sum of one thousand dollars. It has not escaped the observation of the court that the General Arismendi made the passage from Marguerita to the place of capture off the Island of St. Domingo in the short space of nine days; for the owner's letter of instructions to the captain bears date at Marguerita on the 2d day of February, 1818, and on the 11th of the same month the capture was made; and yet with the important fact before us, it is seriously contended, that a voyage which had just been made in nine days could not be performed back again in six weeks. This is a possible case; but we ought not to be expected on slight grounds to believe that a vessel after leaving the Island of Cuba, in the latter end of February, should, on the 18th of April following, be found, not only several miles farther from her destined port than at the time of sailing, but that she had pursued this circuitous route in search of provisions: a story so improbable could hardly, under any circumstance, be entitled to belief; but it becomes absolutely incredible, when so many ports, more contiguous, and where supplies might easily have been obtained, were passed in her way to the Balize, without a single effort to procure a supply at any of them. Why not go to Kingston, in Jamaica, which was in the neighborhood of the place where the capture was made, and to which port the privateer went after making the capture? Her not going there can be accounted for on no supposition other than 356* that of her being well supplied with provisions at the time of her leaving Cuba. It is vain, then, to urge a plea which is contradicted by the internal evidence of the case. If, however, it can be made out that an attempt were really made to reach Marguerita, which was frustrated by adverse winds, or by any one of those disasters which so frequently occur on the ocean, or that the Josefa was forced by stress of weather so very far from the track of a direct voyage to that island, the claimant might still contend that their plea of necessity had been made out. But, on this subject, there is an impenetrable obscurity, which it was their duty to remove. What winds, or what weather were encountered, we are not informed. No log-book, from which alone accurate and safe knowledge might be derived, is produced. A journal of that kind was not even kept, a circumstance which, of itself, excites a suspicion which none of the testimony in the cause is calculated to dispel. But it is not necessary to pursue this inquiry farther, or to take notice of several minor circumstances which are relied on, and which so far from making out a case of real distress, only serve to confirm the view which has already been taken of the other evidence, and leave no reasonable doubt of the whole story being a fiction; or that the want of provisions, if real, at the time of seizure, was produced by a voluntary protraction of the voyage for the purpose, and with the intent of violating the law on which the present libel is founded. If, on testimony so vague, so contradictory, and affording so little satisfaction, this court should award restitution, all the acts of Congress which have been passed to prohibit *357 the importation of slaves into the United States may as well be expunged from the statute book; and this inhuman traffic, for the abolition of which the United States have manifested an early and honorable anxiety, might, under the most frivolous pretexts, be carried on, not only with impunity, but with a profit which would keep in constant excitement the cupidity of those who think it no crime to engage in this unrighteous commerce. In the execution of these laws, no vigilance can be excessive, and restitution ought never to be made, but in cases which are purged of every intentional violation, by proofs the most clear, the most explicit and unequivocal.

But the claimants, not relying exclusively on the plea of necessity, contend, that the capture being piratical, and by a vessel having no commission, they ought not to be injured by any acts of the prize-master which may be deemed infractions of the laws of the United States.

It would, indeed, be unreasonable and unjust to visit upon the innocent owners of this property the sins of a pirate; and were this allegation made out, the court would find no difficulty in making the restitution which is asked for. But is it so? Was the General Arismendi a piratical cruiser? The court thinks not. Among the exhibits is a copy of a commission—which is all that, in such a case, can be expected—which appears to have been issued under the authority of the republic of Venezuela. This republic is composed of the inhabitants of a portion of the dominions of Spain in South America, who have been for *358 some time past, and still are, maintaining a contest for independence with the mother country. Although not acknowledged by our government as an independent nation, it is well known that open war exists between them and His Catholic Majesty, in which the United States maintain strict neutrality. In this state of things, this court cannot but respect the belligerent rights of both parties; and does not treat as pirates the cruisers of either, so long as they act under, and within the scope of their respective commissions. This capture, then, having been made under a regular commission of the government of Venezuela, the captors acquired thereby a title to the vessel and cargo, which could only be divested by recapture, or by the sentence of a prize court of the country under whose commission the capture was made. The courts of neutral nations have no right to interfere, except in cases which do not embrace the present capture. The captors, therefore, at the time of the violation of our laws, must be regarded as the lawful owners of the property, and as capable of working a forfeiture of it, by any infraction on their part of the municipal regulations of the United States. The property, in the present case, not only belonged, at the time, to the captors, in virtue of the capture which they had made, but it is evident from the testimony and admissions in this cause that it was owned at the time of capture by an enemy, and that a condemnation in a prize court of Venezuela was inevitable.

As little foundation is there for resting a claim to restitution on the ransom, which it is 359* alleged took place, of this vessel and cargo. This ransom, whether real or pretended, whether absolute or contingent (about which, doubts may well be entertained), cannot affect the rights of the United States. The forfeiture having attached before any ransom took place, could not be divested by any act between parties, consensual as these were, not only of the fact that a seizure had taken place for a violation of law, but that legal proceedings had been instituted, and were then carrying on, to obtain a sentence of condemnation founded on such violation.

BLAKE ET AL. v. DOHERTY ET AL.

It is essential to the validity of a grant that the thing granted should be so described as to be capable of being distinguished from other things of the same kind. But it is not necessary that the grant itself should contain such a description as without the aid of extrinsic testimony to ascertain precisely what is conveyed.

Natural objects called for in a grant may be proved by testimony, not found in the grant, but consistent with it.

The following description, in a patent, of the land granted, is not void for uncertainty, but may be made certain by extrinsic testimony: "A tract of land in our middle district on the west fork of Cane Creek, the waters of Elk River, beginning at a hickory, running north 1,000 poles to a white oak, then east 800 poles to a stake, then south 1,000 poles to a stake, thence west 800 poles to the beginning, as per plat hereunto annexed doth appear."

360* The plat and certificate of survey annexed to the patent, and a copy of the entry on which the survey was made, are admissible in evidence for this purpose.

A general plan made by authority, conformably to an act of the local legislature, may also be submitted with other evidence to the jury, to avail, quantum valere potest, in ascertaining boundary.

But a demarcation or private survey, made by direction of a party interested under the grant, is inadmissible evidence, because it would enable the grantee to fix a vagrant grant by his own act.

THIS cause was argued by Mr. Swann and Mr. Jones for the plaintiffs in error, and by the Attorney-General and Mr. Kelly for the defendants in error.

Mr. Chief Justice MARSHALL delivered the opinion of the court: This was an ejectment brought in the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of West Tennessee. The plaintiff made title, under a grant from the state of Tennessee, dated in 1808, which comprehended the land in controversy.

The defendants claimed under a patent from the state of North Carolina, dated in 1794, containing the following description of the land granted, viz.: "A tract of land containing 5,000 acres, lying and being in our middle district, on the west fork of Cane Creek, the waters of Elk River, beginning at a hickory running north 1,000 poles to a white oak, then east 800 poles to a stake, then south 1,000 poles to a stake, thence west 800 poles to the beginning, as per plat hereunto annexed doth appear."

For the purpose of designating the land described in this grant, the defendants then gave in evidence the plat and certificate of survey annexed thereto, a certified copy of the entry on which the grant was issued, and the [*361] general plan or plat filed in the cause. They also proved, that this plan or plat was a correct representation of Cane Creek, of the west fork thereof, and of the land claimed by them. They also proved, that in 1806, prior to the entry on which the plaintiff's grant was issued, a survey had been made, and a corner hickory and white oak, and lines around the said tract (as the defendants then claimed), were marked; and, prior to the plaintiffs' entry, were esteemed by the people in the neighborhood to have been marked as the defendants' land. The land in dispute lay within the territory ceded to the United States by the Indians in 1806, and no actual survey thereof had been made previous to the emanation of the grant. Upon this evidence, the counsel for the plaintiff requested the court to inform the jury, that the said demarcation was not sufficient in law to locate the grant to the spot included in the said lines; and that the locality of the said lines could not legally be ascertained, either by the plat annexed to the grant or by the entry or general plan; but the court instructed the jury, that the said demarcation, entry, and general plan, might be used by them for that purpose.

The counsel for the plaintiffs excepted to this direction of the court; and, a verdict and judgment having been given for the defendants, the cause is brought by writ of error before this court.

As the first patentee was a fair purchaser of the quantity of land specified in his grant, and has placed his warrant, which was the evidence of that purchase, in the hands of the [*362] surveyor, a public officer designated by the state to survey the land intended to be granted; and as the land claimed under this grant was actually surveyed and marked out before the plaintiff made his entry, so as to give him full knowledge of the title of the defendants, whatever that title might be, the plaintiff can put himself only on the strict law of his case. But to that strict law he is entitled.

It is contended that the Circuit Court erred, 1st. Because the grant under which the defendants claim is absolutely void for uncertainty; and, consequently, no testimony whatsoever ought to have been admitted to give it locality.

That disposition which all courts ought to feel, to support a grant fairly made for a valuable consideration, receives additional force from the situation in which the titles to land in Tennessee are placed; and the courts of that state have invariably carried construction as far as could be justified to effect this purpose.

It is undoubtedly essential to the validity of a grant that there should be a thing granted, which must be so described as to be capable of being distinguished from other things of the same kind. But it is not necessary that the grant itself should contain such description as, without the aid of extrinsic testimony, to ascertain precisely what is conveyed. Almost all grants of land call for natural objects which must be proved by testimony consistent with the grant, but not found in it. Cane Creek, and its west fork, are to be proved by witnesses. So the hickory which is to constitute the beginning of a survey of a tract of land to lie on the west fork of Cane Creek. If, in the nature of things, it be impossible to find this hickory, all will admit the grant must be void. But if it is not impossible, if we can imagine testimony which will show any particular hickory to be that which is called for in the grant, then it is not absolutely void for uncertainty, whatever difficulty may attend the location of it.

Now, suppose this grant to have been founded on actual survey; suppose the surveyor and chain carriers to go to the hickory claimed by the defendants as their beginning, to show it marked as a beginning, to trace a line of marked trees from this beginning around the land, and to prove that this is the very land which was surveyed for the person in whose favor the grant issued. In such a case, the right of the defendants to hold the land would scarcely be questioned. Yet if the patent was void upon its face, these circumstances could not make it good. The grant purports to have been made on an actual survey; and the non-existence of that survey, though it may increase the difficulty of ascertaining the land granted, does not change the face of the instrument.

It has been said that this patent does not call for a marked hickory, and, therefore, no means exist of distinguishing it from any other hickory. But it may have been marked by the surveyor, as corner trees are generally marked, without noticing the fact in the grant; and it is identity, not notoriety, which is the subject of inquiry.

364*] *Could it even have been known by the patentee, or by those who might purchase from him, that the land had not been surveyed, yet a beginning corner might have been marked, and if the beginning be established, the whole tract is easily found.

We think, then, that testimony might exist to give locality to this grant, and, therefore, that it is not void on its face for uncertainty.

2d. We are next to inquire, whether improper testimony was admitted, and whether the court misdirected the jury.

It has been determined in this court, that the plat and certificate of survey, annexed to the patent, may be given in evidence; and it has been determined in the courts of Tennessee that a copy of the entry on which the survey was made is also admissible. In admitting these papers, then, there was no error. But the court also admitted what is called a general plan, and a survey made prior to the plaintiff's entry of the land as claimed by the defendants.

The bill of exceptions does not so describe this general plan as to enable the court to say, with certainty, what it is. If it is a plan made by authority, in conformity with any act of the legislature, it may be submitted, with other evidence, to the consideration of a jury, to avail, as much as it may, in ascertaining boundary. But the court has also permitted what is denominated a demarcation, which we understand to be a private survey made by direction of a party interested under the grant, and assented to by the defendants, to be given in evidence.

*This private survey might have [*365] been made on any other part of the west fork of Cane Creek, with as much propriety as on that where it has been made. It would have been equally admissible if placed anywhere else on that stream. To allow it any weight, would be to allow the grantee to appropriate, by force of a grant, lands not originally appropriated by that grant. This would subvert all those principles relative to conveyances of land which we have been accustomed to consider as constituting immutable rules of property.

The legislature of Tennessee has certainly not supposed that any individual possessed this power of fixing vagrant grants. In the act of 1807, ch 2, they have enacted that any person claiming under a grant from the state of North Carolina, issued "on a good and valid warrant, the locality of which said grant cannot be ascertained, on account of the vagueness of the calls by the surveyor, or from the calls and corners of the said survey becoming lost or destroyed, or on account of the surveyor and chain carriers being deceased, so that the marks and corners cannot be established, shall be entitled to obtain a grant for the same quantity of land called for in said grant."

This liberal provision would have been totally unnecessary if the grantee might have remedied every uncertainty in his patent by his own act. If under his patent he might survey any vacant land he chose, the privilege of obtaining a new patent would be a very useless one.

*It is obvious that the legislature [*366] did not suspect the existence of this power to make new boundaries where none before had been made, or where none could be found. Neither, as we understand the cases, has this principle been established by the courts of Tennessee. The case relied on for this purpose, is the heirs and devisees of Williamson v. Buchanan (2 Ten. Rep., 278).

In this case Judge White was of opinion that the land was ascertained by the calls of the patent, without resorting to the survey and marks made subsequent to its emanation. Both his argument, and his language, in coming to this conclusion, indicate the opinion that Buchanan's claim to the land in controversy depended on it. After having come to this conclusion, however, he throws out some hints calculated to suggest the idea that these modern marks might possibly have been considered, had the case required it, as the renewal of ancient ones which had been destroyed. But these hints seem rather to have been intended to alarm those who were taking up land held by others under ancient grants, whose boundaries were not accurately defined, except by those modern marks, than to give any positive opinion on the point. At any rate, these suggestions were made in a case where the patent, as construed by the judge, called to adjoin the upper line of another tract, and its general position was consequently ascertained. In such a case, where the body of the land was placed, its particular boundaries might be ascertained by testimony which would not be deemed 367 *sufficient where the patent contained no description which would fix its general position.

Judge Overton, who also sat in this cause, gave more importance to the marks newly made; yet, his opinion, too, seems to be founded on the fact that the body of the land was fixed by the description contained in the patent. "Before the plaintiffs made their entry," he said, "new marks for a corner were shown, running from which the courses of the grant, land would be included, sufficiently notorious in point of conformity with the calls of the grant. The general description, both of the entry and the grant, reasonably agrees with the locality of the land by these new marks." He then argues that these new marks may be considered as replacing others which had been originally made.

The case, however, did not depend on this point, and it was not decided. Had it ever been decided, this court would have felt much difficulty in considering a decision admitting marks as auxiliary evidence to prove precise boundary, in a case where the patent was admitted to contain a description sufficiently certain to place the body of the land, as authority for the admission of marks made by the party himself, in a case where the patent only places the land on a stream, with the length of which we are unacquainted.

We think, then, that the Circuit Court erred in instructing this jury that they might use this demarcation for the purpose of ascertaining the land contained in the grant under which the defendants claimed, and for this error the judgment must be reversed.

368 **Mr. Justice JOHNSON* dissented. The principal difficulties in this case arise from the equivocal nature of the language in which the bill of exceptions is expressed. In that part of it which details the evidence offered, the words are, "that in 1806, or early in 1807, a corner hickory, and a white oak, and lines around said tract, as now claimed and represented in said plat, were marked." The word marked, may Wheat. 5.

be taken either as an adjective or a participle, and in the former sense it would mean, it was then a marked line. If this be its proper sense, it is impossible to doubt that the evidence was altogether unexceptionable. In this sense, I am inclined to think, the word ought to be taken, from reference to the context. For, one general object was to prove notoriety, or notice to the plaintiff, in order to affect him with the charge of obstinacy or folly in running a line which had already been surveyed. And the same inference results from its being stated a few lines after, "that no proof was given of any lines or corners having been marked before 1806." A passage which would have been nugatory, if the word marked had been used as a participle of the verb to mark; for, the affirmance of the action at a specified time, would have implied a negation as to any other time.

But taking this word with its grammatical effect as a participle, then an ambiguity arises on a comparison of the charge prayed and the charge given, as expressed in the subsequent part of the bill of exceptions. For, the prayer is, "that the judge instruct the jury that said demarcation was not in law *sufficient [369 to locate said grant to the spot included in said lines; and, also, that the locality of said lands could not legally be ascertained, either wholly or in part, by the plat annexed to the grant, or by said entry, a copy whereof is annexed as aforesaid, or by said general plan; but the said judge instructed the jury that the said demarcation might be used for that purpose by the jury, and, also, that the plat aforesaid might be used by them, and the said entry, also, and the said general plan for the same purpose."

If the instruction prayed was, that the demarcation, as it is called, considering it as the act of an indifferent person, had not the effect of an original survey, in defining, or laying off to the defendant the land which it embraced, there cannot be a doubt that he was entitled to that charge, and it was error in the court not to have given it. But I am of opinion that it cannot be so understood; for, there is no refusal to give the instruction prayed, and a different instruction given; but the words of the instruction are calculated to express a direct negation of the proposition maintained by the plaintiff. It is obvious, from the language of the charge, that the court considers the instruction prayed as in the same degree applicable to every item of the evidence tendered; and I am, therefore, sanctioned in assuming that the charge did not go to the legal effect of the demarcation, but asserted, that evidence of its having been made, and where it was made, with reference to the conflicting lines of the parties, was proper to go to the jury. Under this view of the subject, I *cannot see [370 how it was possible, unless the grant was void, to withhold it from the jury, when pursuing the inquiry into which they were called to enter. The grant conveys a specified quantity of land, and the locus in quo is the only question to be decided. A reference is made by the grant to a plat annexed, and the defendant must prove that the land he holds conforms in description to the original plat. He must, of course, show what land he does hold, and this can only be done by reference to his marked line. The conformity of the demarcation to the original plat is a subsequent and subordinate question, and one which the jury must decide on, according to the evidence which shall be adduced to that point. But how to introduce it without referring to the defendant's line I cannot perceive.

I cannot subscribe to the opinion that the idea is for a moment to be tolerated that there is anything fictitious or unreal in the plat attached to the solemn grant of the state. It bears upon its face the only evidence which ought to be required, and evidence, in my opinion, which ought not to be contradicted, that a survey actually was made. Nor are marked trees or boundaries indispensable to such a survey; though the lines had been traced out on the soil, or stepped off to the grantee, the grant would attach to the designated spot with all the force that would have been given to it by a fence or wall. Identity is the only question to be decided by a jury, and if they can be satisfied that the land held by the defendant is the same land which was granted to him, it is all that should be required. At 371* least, early *grants should have the benefit of these principles as against those who interfere with existing lines. And this I understand to be the received doctrine of the courts of Tennessee. (Smith v. Buchanan, 2 Tenn. Rep., 308.)

It will be perceived that the sufficiency of the evidence in this case to establish the locus in quo is not in the question. If the verdict was founded on evidence which could not support it, that might have been considered below, on a motion for a new trial. But the single question which the case presents is, whether the evidence here tendered was proper circumstantial evidence to go to the jury, in order to establish the locus in quo. The answer of the court is, that it may be used for that purpose. And, in my opinion, unless it ought to have been rejected altogether on the ground of invalidity of the grant, it was all properly admitted for that purpose; not on the idea that the demarcation operated at all in conveying the estate, but as a necessary preliminary to the whole evidence. Respecting the entry, there can be no doubt; and all the rest was calculated to prove that these lines were marked at an early day, and engrafted upon a general survey of the county, made under an act of the legislature, for the purpose of exhibiting the relative position of estates claimed in the county. This showed the early and continued claim of the defendant; and whether his possession was of the same land which had been granted to him by the state, remained for the jury to decide, upon such evidence as the nature of the case required. Facts may have existed in their 372* own knowledge of the *country, or been brought to their notice from the testimony of others, or may even have been gathered from the face of the plat, and reference to natural objects.

We know the manner in which this country has been sold and settled, and the necessity of yielding a liberal acquiescence to the claims of early grants. So strongly am I impressed with this opinion, that I see no reason why a grant may not have the effect of a standing warrant of survey, as long as the land, purporting to have been surveyed, shall remain unoccupied.

It is doing no injury to the individual right; and the state having received a compensation, and pledged itself for the conveyance of a certain quantity of land, sustains no injury, where the survey is reasonable, and bearing a subsequent conformity to the grant and survey under which the claim is asserted.

In the case before us, it is obvious that the survey offered in evidence was made with reference to the creek, as placed upon the original plat. It does not, it is true, conform to the entry in commencing at the mouth of the west fork, which is obviously the true construction of the entry, but it embraces the mouth of the west fork, and conforms to natural objects. And this appears to be sufficient under the decisions of this court, and the liberal principles admitted in Tennessee in surveying upon entries. (M'Ivers Lessee v. Walker and Lassiter, 9 Cranch, 173, and 2 Ten. Rep., 66, et passim.) At least, I presume the evidence in this case was all properly used toward establishing the right to that part of *the defendant's [373 land which lay above the mouth of the west branch of Cane Creek, with reference to which part the survey might well be supported by his entry; and if it was legally admitted as to any part, the instruction of the judge ought to be sustained.

It has been urged that this idea precludes the necessity of those statutory provisions of Tennessee which permit the holders of grants on which the lands cannot be located to lay their warrants upon other land.

I confess I cannot see the force of this argument; for it is not contended that an individual survey will give any strength to a title otherwise defective, or cure any inherent vice in the original survey. If the plat attached to the grant has reference to nothing from which its locality can be determined, it is not pretended that an individual or private survey will make it better. On the contrary, the defense is founded upon the supposition that the cases provided for by those laws is not this case; that the land admits of being identified, and is that which the defendant has marked off. It would be curious if other courts should decide that the defendant's case was not provided for because it had locality, while we are deciding that it is provided for because it has no locality. He would then have no consolation for the necessity of abandoning his "dulcia arva," and becoming the "novus hospes" of some other resting place.

Judgment reversed.

*JUDGMENT.—This cause came on to [374 be heard on the transcript of the record of the Circuit Court for the District of West Tennessee, and was argued by counsel. On consideration whereof, this court is of opinion that the Circuit Court for the District of West Tennessee erred in instructing the jury that they might use the demarcation, in the bill of exceptions and opinion of the court mentioned, for the purpose of ascertaining the land contained in the grant under which the defendant claimed. It is therefore adjudged and ordered, that the judgment of the said Circuit Court in this case be, and the same is hereby reversed and annulled. It is further ordered, that the said cause be remanded to the said

Circuit Court, with directions to issue a venire facias de novo.

HANDLY'S LESSEE v. ANTHONY ET AL.

The boundary of the state of Kentucky extends only to low water-mark on the western or north-western side of the river Ohio; and does not include a peninsula, or island, on the western or north-western bank, separated from the main land by a channel or bayou, which is filled with water only when the river rises above its banks, and is at other times dry.

When a river is the boundary between two nations or states, if the original property is in neither, and there be no convention respecting it, each holds to the middle of the stream. But when, as *375** in this case, one state (Virginia) is the original proprietor, and grants the territory on one side only, it retains the river within its own domain, and the newly-erected state extends to the river only, and the low water-mark is its boundary.

THIS cause was argued by the Attorney-General for the plaintiff, and by Mr. B. Hardin for the defendants in error.

Mr. Chief Justice MARSHALL delivered the opinion of the court: This was an ejectment brought in the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Kentucky, to recover land which the plaintiff claims under a grant from the state of Kentucky, and which the defendants hold under a grant from the United States, as being part of Indiana. The title depends upon the question whether the lands lie in the state of Kentucky or in the state of Indiana.

At this place, as appears from the plat and surveyor's certificate, the Ohio turns its course, and runs southward for a considerable distance, and then takes a northern direction, until it approaches within less than three miles, as appears from the plat, of the place where its southern course commences. A small distance above the narrowest part of the neck of land which is thus formed, a channel, or what is commonly termed in that country a bayou, makes out of the Ohio, and enters the same river a small distance below the place where it resumes its westward course. This channel, or bayou, is about nine miles by its meanders, three miles and a half in a straight line, and from four to five poles wide. The circuit made *376** by the river appears to be from fifteen to twenty miles. About midway of the channel, two branches empty into it from the north-west, between six and seven hundred yards from each other; the one of which runs along the channel at low water, eastward, and the other westward, until they both enter the main river. Between them is ground over which the waters of the Ohio do not pass until the river has risen about ten feet above its lowest state. It rises from forty to fifty feet, and all the testimony proves that this channel is made by the waters of the river, not of the creeks which empty into it. The people who inhabit this peninsula, or island, have always paid taxes to Indiana, voted in Indiana, and been considered as within its jurisdiction, both while it was a territory and since it has become a state. The jurisdiction of Kentucky has never been extended over them.

The question whether the lands in controversy lie within the state of Kentucky or of Indiana, depends chiefly on the land law of Virginia, and on the cession made by that state to the United States.

Both Kentucky and Indiana were supposed to be comprehended within the charter of Virginia at the commencement of the war of our revolution. At an early period of that war, the question whether the immense tracts of unsettled country which lay within the charters of particular states ought to be considered as the property of those states, or as an acquisition made by the arms of all, for the benefit of all, convulsed our confederacy, and threatened its existence. It was probably with a view to this question that Virginia, in 1779, when she opened her land-office, prohibited the location or entry of any land "on the north-west side of the river Ohio."

In September, 1780, Congress passed a resolution, recommending "to the several states, having claims to waste and unappropriated lands in the western country, a liberal cession to the United States, of a portion of their respective claims, for the common benefit of the Union." And in January, 1781, the commonwealth of Virginia yielded to the United States "all right, title, and claim, which the said commonwealth had to the territory north-west of the river Ohio, subject to the conditions annexed to the said act of cession." One of these conditions is, "that the ceded territory shall be laid out and formed into States." Congress accepted this cession, but proposed some small variation in the conditions, which was acceded to; and in 1783 Virginia passed her act of confirmation, giving authority to her members in Congress to execute a deed of conveyance.

It was intended then by Virginia, when she made this cession to the United States, and most probably when she opened her land-office, that the great river Ohio should constitute a boundary between the states which might be formed on its opposite banks. This intention ought never to be disregarded in construing this cession.

At the trial, the counsel for the defendants moved the court to instruct the jury,

1. That the lessor of the plaintiff cannot recover, the land in contest not being at any time subject to the laws of Kentucky, but to those of Indiana.

*2. Because the evidence does not 378 show that the land is within the limits of the state of Kentucky.

The court instructed the jury that, admitting that the western and north-western boundary of Kentucky included all the islands of the Ohio, and extended to the western and north-western bank of the Ohio, yet no land could be called an island of that river unless it was surrounded by the waters of the Ohio at low water-mark; and to low water-mark only, on the western or north-western side of the Ohio, did the boundaries of the state of Kentucky extend.

The counsel for the plaintiff excepted to this opinion, and then moved the court to instruct the jury, that if they found the land in question was covered by the grant to the lessor of the plaintiff, and that it was surrounded by a regular water channel of the Ohio on the northwestern side, and was, at the middle and usual state of the water in the Ohio, embraced and surrounded by the water of the Ohio, flowing in said channel, it was an island, and within the state of Kentucky. But the court refused to give the instructions aforesaid, but instructed the jury, that if the water did not run through said channel at low water, but left part thereof dry, it was not an island, nor within the state of Kentucky.

To this opinion, also, the counsel for the plaintiff excepted. The jury found a verdict for the defendants, on which the court rendered judgment; which judgment is now before this court on a writ of error.

The two exceptions present substantially the same questions to the court, and may therefore 379* be considered *together. They are, whether land is properly denominated an island of the Ohio unless it be surrounded with the water of the river, when low; and whether Kentucky was bounded on the west and north-west by the low water-mark of the river, or at its middle state; or, in other words, whether the state of Indiana extends to low water-mark, or stops at the line reached by the river when at its medium height.

In pursuing this inquiry, we must recollect that it is not the bank of the river, but the river itself, at which the cession of Virginia commences. She conveys to Congress all her right to the territory "situate, lying, and being, to the north-west of the river Ohio." And this territory, according to express stipulation, is to be laid off into independent states. These states, then, are to have the river itself, wherever that may be, for their boundary. This is a natural boundary, and in establishing it, Virginia must have had in view the convenience of the future population of the country.

When a great river is the boundary between two nations or states, if the original property is in neither, and there be no convention respecting it, each holds to the middle of the stream. But when, as in this case, one state is the original proprietor, and grants the territory on one side only, it retains the river within its own domain, and the newly-created state extends to the river only. The river, however, is its boundary.

"In case of doubt," says Vattel, "every country lying upon a river, is presumed to have 380* no other *limits but the river itself; because nothing is more natural than to take a river for a boundary, when a state is established on its borders; and wherever there is a doubt, that is always to be presumed which is most natural and most probable."

"If," says the same author, "the country which borders on a river has no other limits than the river itself, it is in the number of territories that have natural or indetermined limits, and it enjoys the right of alluvion."<sup>1</sup>

Any gradual accretion of land, then, on the Indiana side of the Ohio, would belong to Indiana, and it is not very easy to distinguish between land thus formed and land formed by the receding of the water.

If, instead of an annual and somewhat irregular rising and falling of the river, it was a daily and almost regular ebbing and flowing of the tide, it would not be doubted that a country bounded by the river would extend to low water-mark. This rule has been established by the common consent of mankind. It is founded on common convenience. Even when a state retains its dominion over a river which constitutes the boundary between itself and another state, it would be extremely inconvenient to extend its dominion over the land on the other side, which was left bare by the receding of the water. And this inconvenience is not less where the rising and falling is annual, than where it is diurnal. Wherever the river is a boundary between states, it is the main, the permanent river, which constitutes that boundary; and the mind will find *itself em- [381] barrased with insurmountable difficulty in attempting to draw any other line than the low water-mark.

When the state of Virginia made the Ohio the boundary of states, she must have intended the great river Ohio, not a narrow bayou into which its waters occasionally run. All the inconvenience which would result from attaching a narrow strip of country lying on the north-west side of that noble river to the states on its south-eastern side, would result from attaching to Kentucky, the state on its south-eastern border, a body of land lying north-west of the real river, and divided from the main land only by a narrow channel, through the whole of which the waters of the river do not pass, until they rise ten feet above the low water-mark.

The opinions given by the court must be considered in reference to the case in which they were given. The sole question in the cause respected the boundary of Kentucky and Indiana; and the title depended entirely upon that question. The definition of an island which the court was requested to give, was either an abstract proposition, which it was unnecessary to answer, or one which was to be answered according to its bearing on the facts in the cause. The definition of an island was only material so far as that definition might aid in fixing the boundary of Kentucky. In the opinion given by the court on the motion made by the counsel for the defendants, they say, that "no land can be called an island of the Ohio unless it be surrounded by the waters of that river at low water-mark." We *are not satisfied [382] that this definition is incorrect, as respected the subject before the court; but it is rendered unimportant by the subsequent member of the sentence, in which they say, "that to low water-mark only, on the western and north-western side of the Ohio, does the state of Kentucky extend."

So, in the motion made by the counsel for the plaintiff, the court was requested to say, that if the waters of the Ohio flowed in the channel, in its middle and usual state, it was not only an island, but "within the state of Kentucky."

If the land was not within the state of Kentucky, the court could not give the direction which was requested. The court gave an instruction substantially the same with that which had been given on the motion of the defendant's counsel.

If it be true that the river Ohio, not its ordinary bank, is the boundary of Indiana, the limits of that state can be determined only by the river itself. The same tract of land cannot be sometimes in Kentucky, and sometimes in Indiana, according to the rise and fall of the river. It must be always in the one state or the other.

1.—L. 1, c. 22, sec. 268.

There would be little difficulty in deciding, that in any case other than land which was sometimes an island, the state of Indiana would extend to low water-mark. Is there any safe and secure principle, on which we can apply a different rule to land which is sometimes, though not always, surrounded by water?

So far as respects the great purposes for which the river was taken as a boundary, the two cases 383* seem to be within the same reason, and to require the same rule. It would be as inconvenient to the people inhabiting this neck of land, separated from Indiana only by a bayou or ravine, sometimes dry for six or seven hundred yards of its extent, but separated from Kentucky by the great river Ohio, to form a part of the last-mentioned state, as it would for the inhabitants of a strip of land along the whole extent of the Ohio, to form a part of the state on the opposite shore. Neither the one nor the other can be considered as intended by the deed of cession.

If a river, subject to tides, constituted the boundary of a state, and at flood the waters of the river flowed through a narrow channel, round an extensive body of land, but receded from that channel at ebb, so as to leave the land it surrounded at high water, connected with the main body of the country this portion of territory would scarcely be considered as belonging to the state on the opposite side of the river, although that state should have the property of the river. The principle that a country bounded by a river extends to low water-mark, a principle so natural, and of such obvious convenience as to have been generally adopted, would, we think, apply to that case. We perceive no sufficient reason why it should not apply to this.

The case is certainly not without its difficulties; but in great questions which concern the boundaries of states, where great natural boundaries are established in general terms, with a view to public convenience, and the avoidance of controversy, we think the great object, where 384* it can be distinctly perceived, *ought not to be defeated by those technical perplexities which may sometimes influence contracts between individuals. The state of Virginia intended to make the great river Ohio, throughout its extent, the boundary between the territory ceded to the United States and herself. When that part of Virginia which is now Kentucky became a separate state, the river was the boundary between the new states erected by Congress in the ceded territory and Kentucky. Those principles and considerations which produced the boundary, ought to preserve it. They seem to us to require that Kentucky should not pass the main river, and possess herself of lands lying on the opposite side, although they should, for a considerable portion of the year, be surrounded by the waters of the river flowing into a narrow channel.

It is a fact of no inconsiderable importance in this case that the inhabitants of this land have uniformly considered themselves, and have been uniformly considered, both by Kentucky and Indiana, as belonging to the last-mentioned state. No diversity of opinion appears to have existed on his point. The water on the north-western side of the land in controversy seems not to have been spoken of as a part of the river, but as a bayou. The people of the vicinage, who viewed the river in all its changes, seem not to have considered this land as being an island of the Ohio, and as a part of Kentucky, but as lying on the north-western side of the Ohio, and being a part of Indiana.

*The compact with Virginia, under [385] which Kentucky became a state, stipulates, that the navigation of, and jurisdiction over, the river, shall be concurrent between the new states and the states which may possess the opposite shores of the said river. This term seems to be a repetition of the idea under which the cession was made. The shores of a river border on the water's edge.

LA AMISTAD DE RUES.

ALMIRAL, Libelant.

Quære, Whether, where a prize has been taken by a privateer fitted out in violation of our neutrality, the vessels of the United States have a right to recapture the prize and bring it into our ports for adjudication.

In cases of marine torts, the probable profits of a voyage are not a fit rule for the ascertainment of damages.

In cases of violation of our neutrality by any of the belligerents, if the prize comes voluntarily within our territory, it is restored to the original owners by our courts. But their jurisdiction for this purpose, under the law of nations, extends only to restitution of the specific property, with costs and expenses, during the pendency of the suit, and does not extend to the infliction of vindictive damages as in ordinary cases of marine torts.

Where the original owner seeks for restitution in our courts upon the ground of a violation of our neutrality by the captors, the onus probandi rests upon him, and if there be reasonable doubt respecting the facts, the court will decline to exercise jurisdiction.

APPPEAL from the District Court of Louisiana.

*This was the case of a Spanish ship [386] captured by the Venezuelan privateer La Guerriere, on the high seas, in November, 1817, and afterwards forcibly taken possession of near the mouth of the Mississippi, by a detachment from the United States ketch, Surprise, and brought into the port of New Orleans. A libel was there filed in the District Court, in behalf of the original Spanish owners, claiming restitution of the property, upon the ground (among other things) that the privateer had augmented her crew in the United States, during the cruise, and before the capture. A claim was given in by the original captors, denying the allegations in the libel, and praying restitution of the property as lawfully captured. At the hearing in the District Court, the cause turned almost entirely upon the question of the augmentation of the crew, and the court decreed restitution of the property to the original Spanish owners with damages, which were ordered to be ascertained by assessors. The assessors reported damages as follows:

To the owners of the ship
for loss by plunder,	$ 625 00
And to the owners of the cargo for loss of market by the capture,	4,000 00
And loss by plunder,	575 00
In the whole,	$5,200. 00

The report was confirmed by the court, and damages decreed accordingly. From this decree, the captors appealed to this court.

387*] Mr. C. J. Ingersoll, for the appellants, argued upon the facts, to show that there was no sufficient evidence to prove that the privateer had augmented her force in the ports of the United States. He insisted that the burthen of proof to establish this fact rested with the original Spanish owners, who claimed restitution upon it; and that they had not shown, beyond all reasonable doubt, to the satisfaction of the court, that the captors had increased their armament in violation of our neutrality. He also argued, that supposing the misconduct on the part of the captors ever so clearly established by the evidence, the jurisdiction of our courts does not extend to the infliction of vindictive damages for their offense, but is limited by the law of nations to restitution of the specific property illegally captured. To carry it further, would be to assume the entire prize jurisdiction with all its incidents, which is exclusively vested in the courts of the captor's country. At all events, it is well established that the probable profits of a voyage is not a fit rule for the assessment of damages in cases of marine torts, and even upon that ground alone the decree must be reversed.

The Attorney-General, contra, insisted, that the evidence of an illegal augmentation of the force of the privateer in our ports was sufficiently established by the evidence. He argued, that where the neutrality of our ports is violated in this manner, and the property captured is brought within our territory, the courts of this country, proceeding in rem, are bound not merely to restore the specific property 388*] erty *to the original owners, but to restore it with costs and damages, as in an ordinary case of illegal seizure. Being possessed of the principal question of prize or no prize, that necessarily draws after it all incidental questions; and the one is no more an invasion of the exclusive jurisdiction of the belligerent prize courts than the other. The neutral tribunal having taken jurisdiction for the purpose of vindicating the neutrality of its own country, by placing things in the same state they would have been in, had not that neutrality been violated, can only do complete justice between the parties by inflicting upon the captors such damages as will afford the original owners an indemnity for the loss they have sustained.

Mr. Justice STORY delivered the opinion of the court, and, after stating the facts, proceeded as follows: We pass over the question whether, supposing there was an illegal augmentation of the crew of the privateer in our ports, the American captors had any right forcibly to bring in the prize for adjudication. It is an important question, and when it shall be necessary to decide it, it will deserve serious consideration. The present cause may well be disposed of without any discussion concerning it.

Two questions have been made at the bar: 1. Whether, in point of fact, the illegal augmentation of the crew is so established as to entitle the Spanish libelants to restitution. 2. If so, whether the damages were rightfully awarded.

*The last question will be first consid- [389] ered. And as to the item of damages for loss of market, we are all of opinion that it is clearly inadmissible. In cases of marine torts, this court have deliberately settled that the probable profits of a voyage are not a fit mode for the ascertainment of damages.<sup>1</sup> It is considered that the rule is too uncertain in its own nature, and too limited in its applicability, to entitle it to judicial sanction. The same principle must govern in the present case.

But a more general objection is to the allowance of any damages in cases of this sort, as between the belligerents. The doctrine heretofore asserted in this court is, that whenever a capture is made by any belligerent in violation of our neutrality, if the prize come voluntarily within our jurisdiction, it shall be restored to the original owners. This is done upon the footing of the general law of nations; and the doctrine is fully recognized by the act of Congress of 1794. But this court have never yet been understood to carry their jurisdiction, in cases of violation of neutrality, beyond the authority to decree restitution of the specific property, with the costs and expenses during the pending of the judicial proceedings. We are now called upon to give general damages for plunderage, and if the particular circumstances of any case shall hereafter require it, we may be called upon to inflict exemplary damages to the same extent as in the ordinary cases of marine torts. We entirely disclaim any right to inflict such *damages; and con- [390] sider it no part of the duty of a neutral nation to interpose, upon the mere footing of the law of nations, to settle all the rights and wrongs which may grow out of a capture between belligerents. Strictly speaking, there can be no such thing as a marine tort between the belligerents. Each has an undoubted right to exercise all the rights of war against the other; and it cannot be a matter of judicial complaint, that they are exercised with severity, even if the parties do transcend those rules which the customary laws of war justify. At least, they have never been held within the cognizance of the prize tribunals of neutral nations. The captors are amenable to their own government exclusively, for any excess or irregularity in their proceedings; and a neutral nation ought no otherwise to interfere, than to prevent captors from obtaining any unjust advantage by a violation of its neutral jurisdiction. Neutral nations may, indeed, inflict pecuniary, or other penalties, on the parties for any such violation; but it then does it professedly in vindication of its own rights, and not by way of compensation to the captured. When called upon by either of the belligerents to act in such cases, all that justice seems to require is, that the neutral nation should fairly execute its own laws, and give no asylum to the property unjustly captured. It is bound, therefore, to restore the property if found within its own ports; but beyond this it is not obliged to interpose between the belligerents. If, indeed, it were otherwise, there would be no end to the difficulties and embarrassments of neutral prize 391*] tribunals. They would be compelled to decide in every variety of shape upon marine trespasses in rem and in personam, between belligerents, without possessing adequate means of ascertaining the real facts, or of compelling the attendance of foreign witnesses; and thus they would draw within their jurisdiction almost every incident of prize. Such a course of things would necessarily create irritations and animosities, and very soon embark neutral nations in all the controversies and hostilities of the conflicting parties. Considerations of public policy come, therefore, in aid of what we consider the law of nations on this subject; and we may add, that Congress in its legislation has never passed the limit which is here marked out. Until Congress shall choose to prescribe a different rule, this court will, in cases of this nature, confine itself to the exercise of the simple authority to decree restitution, and decline all inquiries into questions of damages for asserted wrongs. The decree for damages is therefore unhesitatingly reversed.

The other question presents more difficulty. It must be admitted that there is positive testimony directly to the point of the illegal augmentation of the crew of the privateer; and if it stood uncontradicted, and were liable to no deduction, the libelant would certainly be entitled to restitution. But the testimony as to the augmentation come chiefly from very obscure persons, and is, in itself, in many respects, loose and equivocal; and that of one, at least, of the principal witnesses, is, in a most 392*] material fact, directly contradicted by a written document, whose verity has not been questioned. It is proved, by the report of an inspector made to the custom-house, that at the arrival of the privateer in port, she had on board forty-nine men; yet, the witness alluded to, expressly alleges, that at the time of her arrival at New Orleans, she had not more than ten or twelve persons on board. It appears, too, that the crew of the privateer was wholly composed of foreigners, principally persons from the Spanish Main, and from St. Domingo. Being arrived at New Orleans in the course of a cruise, which is not proved to have ended there, the natural presumption is, that her original crew continued attached to her; and this presumption is considerably fortified by the fact, that though the officers of the custom-house of that port vigilantly inquire into cases of this nature, there is nothing in their testimony that in the slightest degree affects the conduct of the privateer in an unfavorable manner. It certainly cannot be said that the evidence is free from all reasonable doubt. And, in cases of this nature, where the libelant seeks the aid of a neutral court to interpose itself against a belligerent capture, on account of a supposed violation of neutrality, we think the burden of proof rests upon him. To justify a restitution to the original owners, the violation of neutrality should be clearly made out. If it remains doubtful, the court ought to decline the exercise of its jurisdiction, and leave the property where it finds it. We cannot say that the present case is clear from reasonable doubt; and, *therefore, we re- 393verse the decree of the District Court, and order restitution to be made to the original captors; but, under all the circumstances, the parties are to bear their own costs.

Decree reversed.

DECREE.—This cause came on to be heard on the transcript of the record of the District Court of the United States for the District of Louisiana, and was argued by counsel. On consideration whereof, it is decreed and ordered, that the decree of the said District Court, in this case, be, and the same is hereby reversed and annulled. And this court, proceeding to pass such decree as the said District Court should have passed, it is further decreed and ordered, that the libel be dismissed, and the said ship La Amistad, her tackle, apparel and furniture, and cargo, be restored to the claimants. And it is further ordered, that each party pay their own costs.

*[COMMON LAW.] 394

LYLE ET AL. v. RODGERS.

Where claims against a party, both in his own right, and in a representative character, are submitted to the award of arbitrators, it is a valid objection to the award; that it does not precisely distinguish between moneys which are to be paid by him in his representative character, and those for which he is personally bound.

An award may be void in part, and good for the residue. But if the part which is void be so connected with the rest as to affect the justice of the case between the parties, the whole is void.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for the District of Columbia.

This was an action of debt against the defendant, on a bond given by Jerusha Dennison, and the defendant, to the plaintiffs, with a condition to perform the award of certain persons chosen to arbitrate all differences, &c., between the plaintiffs and Jerusha Dennison, either as administratrix of Gideon Dennison, deceased, or in any other capacity. The condition of the obligation is in these words: "Whereas the said Jerusha Dennison, and the said James Lyle and Joshua B. Bond, have agreed to refer all matters in dispute between them, to the award and arbitrament of David Winchester and Thomas Tenant, of the city of Baltimore; and in case they differ in opinion, then to them and such third person as the said David Winchester and Thomas Tenant shall choose and appoint. Now, the condition of the obligation is such, that if the above bound Jerusha Dennison, her heirs, executors and administrators, do, and shall well and truly stand to, abide by, and keep the award and arbitrament of the said Da-

395*] vid *Winchester and Thomas Tenant, arbiters, indifferently named and appointed by them to arbitrate, award, and adjudge of, and concerning all actions and causes of actions, debts, dues, controversies, claims or demands whatsoever, both at law and in equity, which the said James Lyle and Joshua B. Bond have, or either of them hath, against her, the said Jerusha Dennison, as administratrix of Gideon Dennison, or in any other capacity. Or in case the said arbitrators shall differ in opinion, if then the said Jerusha Dennison, her heirs, executors and administrators, and every of them, do, and shall stand to, abide by, perform and keep the award and arbitrament of them, the said David Winchester and Thomas Tenant, or either of them, and of such discreet and indifferent person as they shall elect and appoint as a third person as aforesaid; then this obligation to be void, and of none effect; otherwise to be and remain in full force and virtue."

Upon this submission, the following award was made: "Whereas certain differences have arisen between Joshua B. Bond and James Lyle, of the city of Philadelphia, in the state of Pennsylvania, of the one part, and Jerusha Dennison, of Harford county, in the state of Maryland, of the other part; and whereas, for the purpose of putting an end to the said differences, the said parties, by their several bonds, bearing date the fifteenth day of November last past, have reciprocally become bound, each to the other, in the penal sum of $12,000, current money of the United States, to stand to, abide by, perform, and keep the award of David Winchester and Thomas Tenant, arbiters indifferently named and appointed to arbitrate, adjudge, and award of, and concerning all actions, or causes of actions, debts, dues or demands, whatsoever, both of law and in equity, which the said Joshua B. Bond, and James Lyle, or either of them, have against the said Jerusha Dennison, as administratrix of Gideon Dennison, or in any other capacity:

"Whereupon, we, the above-named arbitrators, after having heard the allegations of the parties, proceeded to an examination of the accounts, documents and proofs, by them respectively produced, and having maturely considered the same, do adjudge and award in manner and form following:

"First. We do adjudge and award, that there is due from Jerusha Dennison to Joshua B. Bond and James Lyle, the sum of $8,726.41, with interest from this date, until paid; upon the payment whereof, all suits at law and in equity, between them, shall cease and determine. And,

"Second. We do adjudge and award, that upon the payment by the said Jerusha Dennison of the sum above awarded, with interest, as aforesaid, the said Joshua B. Bond and James Lyle shall execute to the said Jerusha Dennison, a good and sufficient release of all claims against her, both in her private capacity and as administratrix of the late Gideon Dennison; and, also, that they shall reconvey, or release, as the case may require, all lands heretofore conveyed or pledged to them by the late Gideon Dennison, as a collateral security; and further, 397*] that they shall deliver *to the said Jerusha Dennison, or account for on oath, all bonds, notes, bills, or other securities heretofore given to them by the late Gideon Dennison, as collateral security. And,

"Lastly. We do adjudge and award, that this award shall be conclusive between the parties."

The sum awarded by the arbitrators not having been paid, this suit was instituted. The defendant, after praying oyer of the bond, and of the condition, pleaded no award. The plaintiffs, in their replication, set forth the award, and assigned as a breach of it, the non-payment of the sum of $8,726.46, with interest, awarded to be due to them from the said Jerusha Dennison. The defendant rejoined, that among the matters in dispute between the parties, was a dispute relating to certain lands conveyed in fee-simple by Gideon Dennison, the intestate of the said Jerusha Dennison, to the plaintiffs, in his life-time, without any condition or defeasance expressed therein, but with an understanding and agreement between them that the same should be held by the plaintiffs as a collateral security for the payment of whatever debt was due from the said Gideon Dennison to the plaintiffs. And, also, as to certain other lands and land titles, pledged in like manner as a collateral security for the said debt. But because the said matters in dispute are left unsettled by the said award, and for other causes appearing on the face of the said submission and award, the arbitrators made thereon no award, &c.

To this rejoinder the plaintiffs demurred, and the defendants joined in demurrer. It was, however, *afterwards agreed between [398] the parties, that instead of arguing the demurrer, the matter contained in the foregoing pleadings, and the law arising thereon, should be subject to the opinion of the court, on a statement of facts made by the parties, and the questions stated as arising thereon.

This statement admits the submission, the appearance of the parties before the arbitrators, the award, due notice thereof, a demand of the sum awarded to be due, and a refusal to pay the same. The statement also contains certain letters which passed between the plaintiffs and Jerusha Dennison, and Samuel Hughes, acting for and in behalf of the said Jerusha, dated in 1799 and 1800; and, also, a letter from the plaintiffs, dated in 1800, addressed to Mr. Hollingsworth, a lawyer of Baltimore, containing a copy of the correspondence above mentioned, and transmitting him a note for $5,568, drawn by Gideon Dennison in his life-time, of which the plaintiffs were holders, and which had been regularly protested. On this note, Mr. Hollingsworth was requested to take the proper means to obtain payment. The correspondence admitted that "grants of lands in North Carolina and Tennessee had been given as security, without any acknowledgment or receipt for the same;" but contained no information whatever ascertaining what grants were so given, although full information on that subject had been requested on the part of Jerusha Dennison.

Mr. Jones, for the plaintiffs, stated, 1. That the first objection made to the award by the defendant was, *that the arbitrators [399] had not determined all the matters in controversy between the parties. But the only evidence to support this allegation is inadmissible and insufficient for that purpose; and the arbitrators have done enough if they decide all that the parties submit to them. 2. It is also objected, that the administratrix could not submit differences relative to her intestate's estate to arbitration. But the right of executors and administrators to submit to arbitration is well established by authorities, and the submission is an admission of assets to the extent which may be awarded; or, rather, it is a personal engagement to pay whatever the arbitrators may direct, without regard to the question of assets.<sup>1</sup> 3. But it is again objected, that the award is void for uncertainty. To which it is answered, that the universality of the award is advantageous to the defendant, and that a general release, such as the award contemplates, is the best release for him. In the old cases, the judges employed all their astuteness to defeat awards; but in the progress of society, they have been justly viewed with more favor, and many things are now deemed certain which were formerly considered incurably bad. It is not necessary that everything should be stated with positive certainty in the award itself. It may be rendered certain by reference aliunde. The question is, whether the party has a certain and definite remedy. Here the defendant may show that certain deeds have been executed, and are not re-400 leased. It is sufficiently certain *what bonds, &c., may be delivered up. It is within the knowledge of the parties. If the plaintiffs should attempt to sue upon other securities, the award might be pleaded in bar, with an averment that they were meant to be included.<sup>2</sup> As to the alternative part of the award, to deliver up the papers, or account for them on oath; an alternative award is good, if certain.<sup>3</sup> This is sufficiently certain. They shall deliver them up, or disclose where they are. Why might not the arbitrators direct the bonds, &c., to be accounted for on oath, instead of being actually delivered up?

Mr. Pinkney and Mr. Key, contra, contended, 1. That the award was of a controversy about lands, which the administratrix, in her representative character, was not competent to submit to arbitration. That this was the nature of the controversy appears from the letters offered in evidence, which are competent evidence of what was in dispute. It appears also from the award itself. But this award is no proof of assets. That question was referred to the arbitrators. If they say the money shall be paid, it finds assets; otherwise, if they only decide that so much is due. But they have not decided either, as to J. Dennison in her representative character. 2. The award finds a sum due from J. Dennison, but does not say that she shall pay it. Now, the arbitrators may have intended merely to liquidate the claim, leaving it to her to pay it or not, as 401 she might, or might *not be satisfied with the restoration by the plaintiffs of the property pledged. The court will not intend that it was meant that she should pay, whether they offered to restore the pledges or not. And even if this were doubtful, it adds another objection upon the ground of uncertainty. 3. There are several other uncertainties. It is uncertain what "lands" are meant; and they are to be reconveyed or released "as the case may require." Who is to judge what the case may require? If the arbitrators had said who should judge, it would even then be void; for it is a judicial act which they could not delegate to any one.<sup>4</sup> The lands are to be "released." But to whom? The award does not state. They are to deliver "all bonds," &c., heretofore given to them by the late G. Denuison as collateral security." But they are not specified, and this is a fatal defect.<sup>5</sup> Again, they are required to deliver them, or account for them "on oath." Here it is left uncertain how they are to account for them on oath. It is said that it means that they shall disclose where they are. But what good will this do the administratrix, if she does not get them? If the plaintiffs knew where the securities were, the arbitrators ought to have compelled their production. If they do not know, what good will their oath do us? But perhaps it may be said, that it means that they shall account on oath for their value. This, indeed, would be more reasonable than *merely telling us where they were; [402 and if this was the intention of the arbitrators, they ought to have valued them, and could delegate this power to no other person, much less to a party. Suppose it to mean either, the award is void. And it is void for uncertainty, because it may mean either. It is admitted, on the other side, that an award must be certain on its face, or refer to something by which it may be made certain. Now, this award is full of uncertainties on its face, and refers to nothing by which they can be explained. It is said that it refers us to a knowledge of the parties. But that is not sufficient. The case cited from Lord Raymond<sup>6</sup> was between mortgagee and mortgagee, who may be presumed to know, and there was no dispute as to facts; but here it is the case of an administratrix who did not know, and a part of the dispute was what was pledged. All these uncertainties are left to be determined by the plaintiffs, who are to return whatever they may choose. But we have the same right to the pledges which they have to the debt, and the value or amount of neither should be left to the parties. Suppose the award had been, that one party should return all the pledges, and the other should pay all the money borrowed. Here would have been the same uncertainty, but it would have been reciprocal; and if an award that one party should pay all that was lent, or account on oath for all that was lent, would be a nullity; an award that the other party shall return all the pledges, or account for them *on oath, is equally [403 void. The rules relative to awards have been derived from the civil law, and that law deems them void upon the same ground of uncertainty.<sup>7</sup> This award decides nothing, or what is the same thing, it decides what was unimportant, and leaves all that was material to be taken ad referendum. It does not state in what character J. Dennison is indebted to the plaintiffs. The award ought to show the character in which she is chargeable. It is impossible to charge the debt on the estate. If this award had been against her in her representative character, and it had simply declared a debt due from her intestate, specifying the amount, she might have pleaded plene administravit. Otherwise, if it had declared that she should pay a certain sum. But it has done neither, and the award is therefore void for uncertainty. The great object of the arbitration was, to ascertain what deeds were in fact mortgages, though purporting to be absolute conveyances; and what bonds, &c., were pledged, the plaintiffs not having admitted them. It was designed to ascertain the doubtful equitable circumstances of the case; everything, in short, which the arbitrators have forborne to decide. The award recognizes the existence of these conveyances and pledges, but does not ascertain them, nor provide any mode of ascertaining them. It was not general, but specific relief, which was expected from the award. We admit that an alternative award is valid, if entirely good; but if either branch of the alternative 404* be bad, the whole is void.<sup>1</sup> The award here does not entitle the administratrix to a disclosure on oath. If the plaintiffs adopted the alternative of delivering up the securities, they were not to perform the other—that is, to take the oath. The acts were not conjunctive, but disjunctive; and one part being void, the whole is void. The same argument applies to other parts of the award. There is an intimate connection between those which are certain (if there are any such) and those which are uncertain. The whole is therefore void.

Mr. Hopkinson, in reply, argued, that all the objections to the award in this case were merely technical. It was not attempted to impeach it upon the ground of partiality or misconduct in the arbitrators; nor could it be denied that the debt liquidated by it was justly due to the plaintiffs. As to the objection that administrators and executors have no power to submit to arbitration the title to lands, it does not appear by the submission bond that the title to any lands was in dispute, or was submitted. No question as to lands ever came before the arbitrators. And if the arbitrators had awarded as to lands, it might be rejected as surplusage. The alternatives of reconveying or releasing, as the case might require, the lands pledged, would be determined in each particular case by the fact, whether the conveyance was absolute on its face or conditional. If the former, then it was to be reconveyed; if the latter, it 405* was to be released. But it is said that the arbitrators ought to have distinguished the character in which J. Dennison was indebted. This was unnecessary, as she had assumed the whole liability upon herself in her individual capacity. In the bond she has bound herself personally to perform the award, and she has mixed her individual accounts with those of the estate. Non constat, that any part of the debt is due from the estate. The award to reconvey all lands, and to return all bonds, &c., pledged as collateral security, is good; because the arbitrators could not tell what lands were conveyed as collateral security, nor what bonds, &c., were pledged for the same purpose. Both were within the knowledge of the parties, and neither were within the knowledge of the arbitrators. It is denied that if one part of the alternative, as to the securities, is void, the other is so. We do not contend that the arbitrators have decided what was not submitted to them; but we say it was not submitted to them to determine what conveyances were made as pledges, and what were absolute on the face of them. The award is good unless the arbitrators were bound to give a list of the conveyances and security. This they could not do, because they had no means of ascertaining them specifically. But they ascertain them sufficiently by classification, which it is in the power of the parties to apply to each individual case.

Mr. Chief Justice MARSHALL, delivered the opinion of the court: The questions submitted to the *court on the statement of facts [406 made by the parties were, 1st. "Whether the said letters so offered by the defendants, or any of them, are competent and sufficient evidence to prove what matters of dispute or controversy were submitted to the said arbitrators under the said bond."

2d. "Whether the said award in the terms aforesaid, or taken in connection with the evidence so offered by the defendant (if such evidence be decided by the court to be competent and admissible), is valid, and sufficient in law."

The matter contained in the letters was pleaded by the defendant in his rejoinder, as being part of the subject in controversy, and is, consequently, confessed by the demurrer. Had the demurrer been argued, therefore, the first question could not have arisen. But as a statement of facts has been substituted for the demurrer, we presume the question respecting the admissibility of the evidence offered by the defendant is to be considered as if issue had been joined on the fact stated in the rejoinder. So considering it, there is, we think, no doubt of the admissibility of the testimony nor of its competency, taken in connection with the award itself, to prove that a dispute existed respecting the lands mentioned in those letters, which was brought before the arbitrators.

We proceed to the second question, which respects the validity of the award.

The first exception taken to this award is, that it omits to state whether the sum due from Jerusha Dennison was due from her in her own right or as **administratrix* of [407 Gideon Dennison. The claims upon her in both characters are submitted to the referees; and they ought to have decided upon all, and to have distinguished between those which she was required to pay in her representative character, and those for which she was bound personally. Had this case been depending in chancery, where alone the two claims could have been united in one suit, the Chancellor would unquestionably have discriminated between them; and would, in his decree, have ascertained in what character the whole sum was to be paid, or how much was to be paid in each. If this award was made against Mrs. Dennison as administratrix, she would not only be deprived by its form of the right to plead a full administration (a defense which might have been made before the arbitrators, and on which their award does not show certainly that they have decided), but also of the right to use it in the settlement of her accounts as conclusive evidence that the money was paid in her representative character. If this objection to the award is to be overruled, it must be on the supposition that it is made against her personally; yet the statement of facts shows the claim against her to be in her representative character. There is certainly a want of precision in this part of the award, which exposes it to solid objection, and might subject Mrs. Dennison to serious inconvenience.

The second exception to which the court will advert, affects still more deeply the merits of the award, as well as its justice.

It is apparent from the pleadings in the cause, 408* from the facts stated, and from the award itself, that titles to land were deposited by Gideon Dennison, in his life-time, with the plaintiffs, as collateral security for the debt claimed by them; and that the conveyances purported to be absolute. Not only was there uncertainty as to the right of redemption; but it was, so far as the court can discover, absolutely uncertain what lands had been so conveyed.

This subject appears to have been brought before the arbitrators, and they have awarded upon it. Is their award sufficiently certain to give Jerusha Dennison the benefit they intended her? They have awarded "that the said Joshua B. Bond and James Lyle shall reconvey or release, as the case may require, all lands heretofore conveyed or pledged to them by the late Gideon Dennison as a collateral security." The award does not determine what lands were so conveyed. If the arbitrators had directed that all the lands conveyed or pledged by Gideon Dennison should be reconveyed, there would have been some difficulty in ascertaining what lands had been conveyed or pledged, from the uncertainty where deeds might have been recorded, and whether grants might not have been deposited without a conveyance; but they have directed that those lands only shall be reconveyed which had been conveyed or pledged as collateral security. No one of these deeds exhibited on its face any mark of its being made as a collateral security. The question, whether a conveyance was absolute, or as a security only, was a material question, which ought to have been decided by the arbitrators. 409* They have not decided *it, but have left it open to be decided by the parties themselves, or by some other tribunal. This is a very important part of the award, and with respect to this subject, it is incomplete. It is obviously as uncertain now as it was before the award was made, what lands had been conveyed or pledged to Gideon Dennison as collateral security. This part of the award, then, is void, and the question is, whether that part which directs the payment of money be void also.

That an award may be void in part, and good for the residue, will be readily admitted; but if that part which is void be so connected with the rest as to affect the justice of the case between the parties, the whole is void.<sup>1</sup> There is great good sense in this distinction. If A be directed to pay B $100, and also to do some other act not well enough defined to be obligatory, there is no reason why B should not have his $100, because he cannot also get that other thing which was intended for him. But if A be directed to pay B $100, and B to do something for the benefit of A, which is not so defined as to enable A to obtain it, there is much reason why A should not pay the $100; since he cannot obtain that which the arbitrators as much intended he should receive as that he should pay the sum awarded against him.

The cause in 2 Saunders, 292, is in point. In that case the arbitrators awarded that William Pope *should be satisfied and paid by [*410 John Brett, the money due and payable to the said William Pope, as well for task-work as for day-work, and then the said William should pay to the said John the sum of £25 lawful money of England. Mutual releases were also awarded.

It was admitted that so much of the award as directed payment to be made for task-work and day-work was void for uncertainty, inasmuch as the arbitrator had not ascertained how much was to be paid on those accounts; but it was contended that the award was good for the residue, inasmuch as enough remained to make it mutual. But the court said, "that if the clause of task-work and day-work be void, as it is admitted to be, the whole award is void, for it appears that William Pope was awarded to pay the £25, and to give a general release, upon a supposition by the arbitrator that he should be paid the task-work and day-work by virtue of that award; and that not being so, it was not the intention of the arbitrators, as appears by the award itself, that he should pay the money, and give a general release, and yet receive nothing for the task-work and day-work, as by reason of the uncertainty of the award in that part he could not."

The application of this case to that under consideration is complete. The award to reconvey all lands heretofore conveyed or pledged to the plaintiffs by Gideon Dennison, in his life-time, as collateral security, is as uncertain as the award to pay for task-work and day-work already performed; it was as much the *intention of the arbitrators that the [*411 parts of their award which were favorable to the different parties should be dependent on each other in this case as in the case of Pope v. Brett. The arbitrators never could have designed that Bond and Lyle should get their money, and retain their deposits.

In his note upon this case, Sergeant Williams says: "If, by the nullity of the award in any part, one of the parties cannot have the advantage intended for him as a recompense or consideration, for that which he is to do to the other, the award is void in the whole."

This just principle must always remain a part of the law of awards.

The objection to the part of the award which has been considered, applies equally to that part of it which respects bonds, notes, bills, or other securities.

412*] [*LAW OF NATIONS. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW.]

THE UNITED STATES v. HOLMES ET AL.

The courts of the United States have jurisdiction under the act of the 30th of April, 1790, ch. 36, of murder or robbery committed on the high seas, although not committed on board a vessel belonging to citizens of the United States, as if she had no national character, but was held by pirates, or persons not lawfully sailing under the flag of any foreign nation.

In the same case, and under the same act, if the offense be committed on board of a foreign vessel by a citizen of the United States, or on board a vessel of the United States by a foreigner, or by a citizen or foreigner on board of a piratical vessel, the offense is equally cognizable by the courts of the United States.

It makes no difference in such a case, and under the same act, whether the offense was committed on board of a vessel or in the sea, as by throwing the deceased overboard and drowning him, or by shooting him when in the sea though he was not thrown overboard.

THE prisoners were indicted at the Circuit Court of Massachusetts, at the October term of said court, 1818, for that the prisoners being citizens of the United States, on the fourth day of July then last past, with force and arms, upon the high seas, out of the jurisdiction of any particular state, in and on board a certain schooner or vessel, the name whereof being to the jurors unknown, in and upon a person known, and commonly called by the name of Reed, a mariner, in and on board said vessel, in the peace of God, and of the said United States, then and there being, piratically, &c., did make an assault; and that they, the said William Holmes, Thomas War-413*] rington, *otherwise called Warren Fawcett, and Edward Rosewain, with a certain steel dagger, &c., which he, the said William Holmes, in his right hand, then and there had and held, the said person commonly called Reed, in and upon the arms and breast of him, the said Reed, upon the high seas, and on board the vessel aforesaid, and out of the jurisdiction of any particular state, piratically, &c., did strike and thrust, giving to the said person commonly called Reed, in and upon the arms and breast of him, the said Reed, upon the high seas, in and on board the vessel aforesaid, and out of the jurisdiction of any particular state, 'piratically, &c., him, the said person commonly called Reed, cast and threw from out of said vessel into the sea, and plunge, sink and drown him, in the sea aforesaid, of which said grievous wounds, casting, throwing, plunging, sinking and drowning, the said person commonly called Reed, upon the high seas aforesaid, out of the jurisdiction of any particular state, then and there instantly died.

And so the jurors aforesaid, upon their oath aforesaid, do say, that the said William Holmes, &c., him, the said person commonly called Reed, then and there, upon the high seas as aforesaid, and out of the jurisdiction of any particular state, piratically, &c., did kill and murder, against the peace and dignity of the said United States, and against the form of the *statute of the said United [*414 States, in such case made and provided, &c. Upon which indictment the prisoners were found guilty of the offense charged therein. And, thereupon, the counsel for the prisoners moved the court for a new trial for the misdirection of the court upon the points of law which had been raised at the trial. And upon arguing the said motion for a new trial, the several questions occurred before the Circuit Court, which are stated in the opinion of this court, upon which the opinions of the judges of the Circuit Court were opposed.

From the evidence it appeared that a vessel, apparently Spanish (whose national character, however, was not distinctly proved by any documentary evidence, or by the testimony of any person conusant of its character), was captured by two privateers from Buenos Ayres, a prize crew put on board, and the prisoners were of that prize crew. One of the prisoners was a citizen of the United States, and the other prisoners were foreigners. The crime was committed by the prisoners on the person whose death was charged in the indictment, by drowning him on the high seas, he being, at the time, a prize-master of the captured vessel, and thrown or driven overboard by the prisoners. There was no proof who were the owners of the privateers, nor where they resided, nor what were the ships' papers or documents, nor where, nor at what time, they were armed or equipped for war. The privateers had been at Buenos Ayres, and openly kept a rendezvous there, and shipped the crews there. The crews consisted chiefly of Englishmen, Frenchmen, and Americans. *The commander of [*415 one of the privateers was, by birth, a citizen of the United States, and had a family domiciled at Baltimore. The commander of the other was by birth an Englishman, but had long been domiciled at Baltimore. There was no proof that either of them had ever lived at Buenos Ayres, or been naturalized there. All the witnesses agreed that both the privateers were built at Baltimore. They had been at Buenos Ayres, before their sailing on this cruise, but a short time, one about six weeks, the other a few days only.

And the said judges being so opposed in opinion upon the questions aforesaid, the same were then and there, at the request of the district attorney for the United States, stated, under the direction of the judges, and ordered by the court to be certified under the seal of the court to this court, to be finally decided.

This case was argued by the Attorney-General for the United States, and by Mr. Webster for the prisoners, upon the same grounds which are stated in the argument of the preceding cases of The United States v. Klintonck,<sup>1</sup> The United States v. Smith,<sup>2</sup> and The United States v. Furlong et al.<sup>3</sup>

Mr. Justice WASHINGTON delivered the opinion of the court: This case comes before the court upon a division of opinion of the judges of the Circuit Court for the District of Massachusetts. The defendants are indicted for 416*] murder committed on the *high seas; and the questions adjourned to this court are,

1. Whether the Circuit Court had jurisdiction of the offense charged in the indictment, unless the vessel on board of which the offense was committed was, at the time, owned by a citizen, or citizens of the United States, and was lawfully sailing under its flag.

2. Whether the court had jurisdiction of the offense charged in the indictment, if the vessel on board of which it was committed, at the time of the commission thereof, had no real national character, but was possessed and held by pirates, or by persons not lawfully sailing under the flag, or entitled to the protection of any government whatever.

3. Whether it made any difference as to the point of jurisdiction, whether the prisoners, or any of them, were citizens of the United States, or that the offense was consummated, not on board of any vessel, but in the high seas.

4. Whether the burthen of proof of the national character of the vessel on board of which the offense was committed was on the United States, or, under the circumstances stated in the charge of the court, was on the prisoner.

The two first questions have been decided by this court at its present session. In Klintock's case,<sup>1</sup> it was laid down, that to exclude the jurisdiction of the courts of the United States, in cases of murder or robbery committed on the high seas, the vessel in which the offender is, 417*] or to which he belongs, must *be, at the time, in fact, as well as in right, the property of a subject of a foreign state, and in virtue of such property, subject, at that time, to his control. But if the offense be committed in a vessel, not at the time belonging to subjects of a foreign state, but in possession of persons acknowledging obedience to no government or flag, and acting in defiance of all law, it is embraced by the act of the 30th of April, 1790. It follows, therefore, that murder or robbery committed on the high seas may be an offense cognizable by the courts of the United States, although it was committed on board of a vessel not belonging to citizens of the United States, as if she had no national character, but was possessed and held by pirates, or persons not lawfully sailing under the flag of any foreign nation.

The third question contains two propositions: 1. As to the national character of the offender, and of the person against whom it is committed; and, 2. As to the place where the offense is committed.

In respect to the first, the court is of opinion, and so it has been decided during the present term, that it makes no difference whether the offender be a citizen of the United States or not. If it be committed on board of a foreign vessel by a citizen of the United States, or on board of a vessel of the United States by a foreigner, the offender is to be considered, pro hac vice, and in respect to this subject, as belonging to the nation under whose flag he sails. If it be committed either by a citizen or a foreigner, on board of a piratical vessel, the offense is equally cognizable by the courts of the United 418*] *States, under the above-mentioned law. 2. Upon this point, the court is of opinion that it makes no difference whether the offense was committed on board of a vessel or in the sea, as by throwing the deceased overboard and drowning him, or by shooting him when in the sea, though he was not thrown overboard. The words of the above act of Congress are general, and speak of certain offenses committed upon the high seas, without reference to any vessel whatsoever on which they should be committed; and no reason is perceived why a more restricted meaning should be given to the expressions of the law than they literally import. In the case of Furlong for the murder of Sunley, decided during the present term of the court, it was certified, that murder committed from on board an American vessel, by a mariner sailing on board an American vessel, by a foreigner on a foreigner, in a foreign vessel, is within the act of the 30th of April, 1790.<sup>2</sup> It follows from this, and the principles laid down in Klintock's case, that the same offense committed by any person from on board a vessel having no national character, as by throwing a person overboard, and drowning him, is within the same law.

It is stated, in the charge of the court below, that it did not appear by any legal proof that the privateers had commissions from Buenos Ayres, or any ship's papers or documents from that government, or that they were ever recognized as ships of that nation, or of its subjects; or who were the owners, where they resided, or when or where the privateers were armed or equipped. But it did appear *in proof [419] that the captains and crew were chiefly Englishmen, Frenchmen, and American citizens; that the captains were both domiciled at Baltimore, where the family of one of them resided, and that he was by birth an American citizen. It was also proved that the privateers were Baltimore built.

Under these circumstances, the court is of opinion that the burthen of proof of the national character of the vessel on board of which the offense was committed, was on the prisoners.

CERTIFICATE.—This cause came on to be heard on the transcript of the record of the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Massachusetts, and on the questions on which the judges of that court were divided in opinion, and was argued by counsel. On consideration whereof, this court is of opinion:

1. That the said Circuit Court had jurisdiction of the offense charged in the indictment, although the vessel on board of which the offense was committed was not, at the time, owned by a citizen, or citizens of the United States, and was not lawfully sailing under its flag.

2. The said Circuit Court had jurisdiction of the offense charged in the indictment, if the vessel, on board of which it was committed, had, at the time of the commission thereof, no real national character, but was possessed and held by pirates, or by persons not lawfully sailing under the flag, or entitled to the protection of any government whatsoever.

3. That it made no difference, as to the point of jurisdiction, whether the prisoners, or any 420*] of them, *were citizens of the United States, or whether the deceased was a citizen of the United States, or that the offense was committed not on board any vessel, but on the high seas.

4. That the burthen of proof of the national character of the vessel, on board of which the offense was committed, was, under the circumstances stated in the charge of the court, on the prisoners.<sup>1</sup>

OWINGS v. SPEED, ET AL.

The present constitution of the United States did not commence its operation until the first Wednesday in March, 1789, and the provision in the constitution, that "no state shall make any law impairing the obligation of contracts," does not extend to a state law enacted before that day, and operating upon rights of property vested before that time.

The books of a corporation, established for public purposes, are evidence of its acts and proceedings.

THIS cause was argued by Mr. B. Hardin for the defendants, no counsel appearing for the plaintiff.

Mr. Chief Justice MARSHALL delivered the opinion of the court: This was an ejectment brought by the plaintiff in the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Kentucky, to recover a lot of ground lying in Bardstown. 421*] *This town was laid off in 1780, on a tract of land consisting of 1,000 acres, for which, in 1785, a patent was issued by the commonwealth of Virginia to Bard and Owings. In 1788 the legislature of Virginia passed an act vesting 100 acres—part of this tract—in trustees, to be laid off in lots, some of them to be given to settlers, and others to be sold for the benefit of the proprietors. The cause depends, mainly, on the validity of this act. It is contended to be a violation of that part of the constitution of the United States which forbids a state to pass any law impairing the obligation of contracts.

Much reason is furnished by the record for presuming the consent of the proprietors to this law; but the Circuit Court has decided the question independently of this consent, and that decision is now to be reviewed.

Before we determine on the construction of the constitution in relation to a question of this description, it is necessary to inquire whether the provisions of that instrument apply to any acts of the state legislatures which were of the date with that which it is now proposed to consider.

This act was passed in the session of 1788. Did the constitution of the United States then operate upon it?

In September, 1787, after completing the great work in which they had been engaged, the convention resolved that the constitution should be laid before the Congress of the United States, to be submitted by that body to conventions of the several states, to be convened by their respective legislatures, *and [*422 expressed the opinion, that as soon as it should be ratified by the conventions of nine states, Congress should fix a day on which electors should be appointed by the states, a day on which the electors should assemble to vote for President and Vice-President, "and the time and place for commencing proceedings under this constitution."

The conventions of nine states having adopted the constitution, Congress, in September or October, 1788, passed a resolution in conformity with the opinions expressed by the convention, and appointed the first Wednesday in March of the ensuing year as the day, and the then seat of Congress as the place, "for commencing proceedings under the constitution."

Both governments could not be understood to exist at the same time. The new government did not commence until the old government expired. It is apparent that the government did not commence on the constitution being ratified by the ninth state; for these ratifications were to be reported to Congress, whose continuing existence was recognized by the convention, and who were requested to continue to exercise their powers for the purpose of bringing the new government into operation. In fact, Congress did continue to act as a government until it dissolved on the first of November by the successive disappearance of its members. It existed potentially until the 2d of March, the day preceding that on which the members of the new Congress were directed to assemble.

The resolution of the convention might originally *have suggested a doubt [*423 whether the government could be in operation for every purpose before the choice of a President; but this doubt has been long solved, and were it otherwise, its discussion would be useless, since it is apparent that its operation did not commence before the first Wednesday in March, 1789, before which time Virginia had passed the act which is alleged to violate the constitution.

In the trial of the cause, the defendant produced a witness to prove that the lot for which the suit was instituted, was a part of the 100 acres vested in trustees by the act of assembly. To this testimony the plaintiff objected, because the witness stated that he had sold a lot in Bardstown, with warranty, and was in possession of another. He added, that no suit had been brought for the said lot, and that he was not interested in this suit. The court admitted the witness, and to this opinion also a bill of exceptions was taken.

It is so apparent that the witness had no interest in the suit in which he was examined, and it is so well settled that only an interest in that suit could affect his competency, as to make it unnecessary to say more than that the court committed no error in permitting his testimony to go to the jury.

There was also an exception taken to the opinion of the court in allowing the book of the board of trustees, in which their proceedings were recorded, and other records belonging to the corporation, to be given in evidence.

The book was proved by the present clerk, who also proved the handwriting of the first

424*] clerk, and of *the President, who were dead. The trustees were established by the legislature for public purposes. The books of such a body are the best evidence of their acts, and ought to be admitted whenever those acts are to be proved. There was no error in the opinion admitting them.

There is the less necessity in this case for entering more fully into this question, because the record contains other evidence of the facts, which the testimony, to which exceptions were taken, was adduced to prove.

[CHANCERY.]

CONN. ET AL. v. PENN..

In appeals to this court, from the circuit courts, in chancery cases, the parol testimony which is heard at the trial, in the court below, ought to appear in the record.

A final decree in equity, or an interlocutory decree, which, in a great measure, decides the merits of the cause, cannot be pronounced until all the parties to the bill, and all the parties in interest, are before the court.

THIS cause was argued by Mr. Pinkney and Mr. Jones for the appellants, and by the Attorney-General and Mr. Sergeant for the respondent.

425*] **Mr. Chief Justice MARSHALL* delivered the opinion of the court: This is an appeal from a decree of the Circuit Court for the District of Pennsylvania, dismissing the bill of the plaintiffs.

Without going into the merits of the case, the counsel for the plaintiffs contend that the decree ought to be reversed, because it appears to have been pronounced in part on parol testimony, which has not been introduced into the record, and because the decree was made when the parties interested were not all before the court.

The laws of the United States have always proceeded on the supposition, that in revising decrees in chancery, the facts, as well as the law, should be laid before this court. The judiciary act, which directs that the mode of proof shall be by oral testimony, and that witnesses shall be examined, in open court, also directs that a statement of facts shall be placed on the record. The act of 1802 leaves it to the discretion of the courts in those states where testimony in chancery is taken by depositions, to order, on the request of either party, the testimony of the witnesses to be taken by depositions.

The act of 1803 repeals those parts of the judiciary act which authorize a writ of error, and a statement of facts in chancery cases; allows an appeal from the decrees of a Circuit Court sitting in chancery; and directs that a copy of the bill, answer, depositions, and all other proceedings, of what kind soever, in the cause, shall be transmitted to this court, and that no new evidence shall be heard.

*Previous to this act, the facts were [426 brought before this court by the statement of the judge. The depositions are substituted for that statement; and it would seem, since this court must judge of the fact, as well as the law, that all the testimony which was before the Circuit Court ought to be laid before this court. Yet the section which directs that witnesses shall be examined in open court, is not, in terms, repealed.

The court has felt considerable doubts on this subject, but thinks it the safe course to require that all the testimony on which the judge founds his opinion, should, in cases within the jurisdiction of this court, appear in the record. The parties may certainly waive testimony by consent, but if this consent does not appear, it cannot be presumed; and where it is shown on the record that witnesses were examined in open court, this court cannot say how much the opinion of the Circuit Court was influenced, and ought to have been influenced, by their testimony.

In this case an interlocutory decree was rendered which decided, to a great extent, the merits of the cause, at a time when one of the defendants named in the bill was not before the court, and when it appeared that a person not made a defendant was deeply concerned in interest. This decree granted relief on certain conditions, to certain classes of the plaintiffs, and directed them to appear before commissioners, and to exhibit their proof that they came within the descriptions of persons who were entitled to relief. They refused to appear before these commissioners; *and upon [427 the coming in of the report, stating this fact, their bill was dismissed with costs.

The object of this bill was to obtain conveyances from John and William Penn of certain lands which they were supposed to hold as tenants in common, and to which the plaintiffs asserted an equitable title. It was irregular to make the decree which was made respecting the title, until both the defendants were before the court. But it is the fault of the plaintiffs that they were not. The bill prays conveyances of the legal title on the payment of so much money as was still due on certain principles on which they allege their equitable title to have been acquired. It was referred to commissioners to ascertain the amount of these sums, as well as to class the respective claimants according to the interlocutory decree. They refuse to appear before the commissioners, and to exhibit either their equitable titles, or to show the payments they have made. On what pretense can such plaintiffs claim the aid of a court of equity? What is a court to do in such a state of things? Where a party asking its aid refuses to comply with the conditions on which that aid must depend, a court is certainly correct in refusing its aid, and may dismiss the bill. But in such a case, we think it would be harsh to make the decree of dismissal a bar to a future action. It is not certain that this decree is on such a hearing as to be a bar to a future action; and this point is not positively decided. It is unnecessary to decide it, because we think the interlocutory decree was irregular, and ought not to have been made until William Penn, a tenant in common *with John [428 Penn, was before the court. The defendants are left at liberty to proceed with their legal title, and this must be sufficient to prevent the plaintiffs from practicing unnecessary delays.

For the irregularities which have been stated, we think the decree ought to be reversed, and the cause remanded, that the proper proceedings may be had therein.

DECREE.—This cause came on to be heard on the transcript of the record, and was argued by counsel. On consideration whereof, this court is of opinion that the parol testimony stated by the Circuit Court, in the interlocutory decree to have been heard at the trial, ought to have appeared in the record, and that the interlocutory decree ought not to have been pronounced until William Penn was before the court by his answer, or otherwise. This court is therefore of opinion that the decree of the Circuit Court for the District of Pennsylvania, dismissing the bill of the plaintiffs, ought to be reversed, and the same is hereby reversed, and the cause is remanded, that farther proceedings may be had therein, according to equity. All which is ordered and decreed accordingly.

CAMPBELL v. PRATT ET AL.

Explanation of the former decree of this court in the same case, 9 Cranch, 500.

THIS cause was argued by Mr. Key for the appellant, and by Mr. Jones for the respondents.

Mr. Justice JOHNSON delivered the opinion of the court: The principal question in this case is, whether the Circuit Court has executed the decrees formerly pronounced between these parties,<sup>1</sup> according to their true intent and meaning. Some obscurity has been thrown over the meaning of those decrees, from an obvious error in copying them into the minutes. The primary object of this court was, to give to Law the benefit of a foreclosure in all the lots included in the mortgage from Morris, Nicholson & Greenleaf, in whose right Pratt, Francis & Company founded their claim. But being called upon by the equity of intervening interests (in creating which Law himself had had some agency), they decreed a distribution of the whole amount due to Law, between that class of lots, still held by the mortgageor, and 430*] that which had passed into the hands *of the present appellants. This class was again subject to another discrimination, inasmuch as thirteen of the thirty-two purchased by the appellant were subject to a second mortgage, executed by Morris, Nicholson & Greenleaf, to one Duncanson, and the equitable interest in which was adjudged to the assignee of Greenleaf. The sum which thirty-two lots were decreed to contribute to the payment of Law, was to be determined by the ratio which these lots bore to the whole of the mortgaged premises.

It is now contended, that another distribution of the sum thus charged is to be made between the lots thus mortgaged to Duncanson, and the remaining lots of this class. And it is ascertained, that the consequence will be, putting a considerable sum in the pocket of this appellant, to the prejudice of Duncanson's mortgage, as the sale of those thirteen lots falls considerably short of satisfying the sum decreed on that mortgage. That is, that these thirteen lots shall be charged rateably with the sum charged upon the whole class, so as to contribute to relieve the remaining lots, and by thus contributing to the satisfaction of Law's mortgage, leave the larger sum from the sale of the remaining lots to be paid over to this appellant. This, it is contended, is both conformable to the decree and to general principles.

If conformable to the decree, it is in vain to refer to general principles. But we think the purport of the decree is obviously otherwise. Campbell, claiming *as purchaser at [*431 sheriff's sales, under an attachment of the interest of the mortgageors, filed his bill for a redemption of the whole of this class of lots, and the court decreed that he be permitted to redeem, on payment, first, of the ratio of Law's mortgage, charged on this class, secondly, on payment of two-thirds of the amount of principal and interest of the debt due to Duncanson. And as the opposite claimants had filed their bill for a foreclosure, a sale is ordered of the whole of this class of lots to raise the money, to be applied in the same manner, if Campbell should fail in six months to redeem. The application of the amount of sales must then be regulated by the right of redemption as decreed to Campbell; and that is, that he pay, first, the contribution to Law, secondly, the amount due to Duncanson, upon which conditions only he could hold the lots discharged of the mortgages, and, consequently, after those payments only could he receive the balance of the money, the representative of his remaining interest in the land.

And this exposition of the decree is perfectly consonant with general principles. All the doubt in the case has been raised by the effort to exhibit this appellant as the holder of an independent interest, that is, as a third incumbrancer. But this is by no means his relative character. He is nothing more than the legal representative of the interests of Morris, Nicholson & Greenleaf, in the lots attached and sold to him. The attachment was levied upon the equity of redemption existing in those mortgageors; *and the decision of this court, in [*432 supporting his right, was placed upon the decision of the courts of Maryland (in which the land then lay), which maintained the validity of an attachment levied upon an equity of redemption. He was, then, nothing more than the assignee of an equity of redemption, and could claim no greater equity as against either Duncanson or Law. That he was not to be considered as a subsequent incumbrancer is conclusively determined by this consideration, that there would then have been no equity of redemption outstanding in anyone. In the relation of the assignee of an equity of redemption, he appeared first in this court, and it is obvious, from the former decree, that in that light only did this court view him. In this light, he could lay claim to no rights inconsistent with those of the creditor; and as far as the proceeds of the 13 lots were adequate to satisfying Duncanson, he could be entitled to nothing until that debt was paid. Any other application of the proceeds of those lots would be preferring the mortgageor to the mortgagee, or the debtor to the creditor; and confer on the assignee of the equity of redemption, a greater equity against the mortgagee than could have been decreed to the original mortgageor.

1.—S. C. 9 Cranch, 500.

That part of the decision of the Circuit Court will therefore be affirmed. But of the remaining two points, it will be necessary to refer the subject, in order to have the statements and evidence in this record compared, upon which a conclusion must be formed. If this appellant has been charged with a greater amount than 433*] his just ratio of the debt due to *Law, he is entitled to relief. But the principles being established, this becomes a mere matter of numerical calculation.

The district judge cannot sit in the Circuit Court in a cause brought by writ of error from the District to the Circuit Court, and the cause cannot in such a case be brought from the Circuit to this court upon a certificate of a division of opinion of the judges.

ERROR to the Circuit Court of Pennsylvania.

This was an action of debt originally brought in the District Court, and carried by writ of error to the Circuit Court, from which it was brought to this court, upon a case agreed by the parties, and a certificate that the opinions of the judges were opposed upon a question arising in the cause.

The cause was argued by Mr. C. J. Ingersoll for the plaintiffs, and by Mr. Sergeant for the defendant.

Mr. Chief Justice MARSHALL delivered the opinion of the court, that it had no jurisdiction of the cause, as the district judge could not sit in the Circuit Court on a writ of error from his own decision, and consequently there could be no division of opinion to be certified to this court.<sup>1</sup> *JUDGMENT.—This cause came on to [*435 be heard on the transcript of the record of the Circuit Court for the District of Pennsylvania, and was argued by counsel. On consideration whereof, it was adjudged and ordered, that the said cause be remanded to the said Circuit Court, it not appearing from the said transcript that this court has jurisdiction in said cause.

APPENDIX.

[*NOTE I.]

Speech of the Honorable JOHN MARSHALL, delivered in the House of Representatives of the United States, on the Resolutions of the Honorable Edward Livingston, relative to Thomas Nash, alias Jonathan Robins.

Mr. MARSHALL said: Believing as he did most seriously, that in a government constituted like that of the United States, much of the public happiness depended, not only on its being rightly administered, but on the measures of administration being rightly understood: on rescuing public opinion from those numerous prejudices with which so many causes might combine to surround it: he could not but have been highly gratified with the very eloquent, and what was still more valuable, the very able, and very correct argument, which had been delivered by the gentleman from Delaware (Mr. Bayard) against the resolutions now under consideration. He had not expected that the effect of this argument would have been universal, but he had cherished the hope, and in this he had not been disappointed, that it would be very extensive. He did not flatter himself with being able to shed much new light on the subject; but as the argument in opposition to the resolutions had been assailed, with considerable ability, by gentlemen of great talents, he trusted the house would not think the time misapplied which would be devoted to the re-establishment of the principles contained in that argument, and to the refutation of those advanced in opposition to it. In endeavoring to do this, he should notice the observations 4*] in support of the resolutions, not in the precise order in which they were made, but as they applied to the different points he deemed it necessary to maintain, in order to demonstrate that the conduct of the executive of the United States could not justly be charged with the errors imputed to it by the resolutions.

His first proposition, he said, was, that the case of Thomas Nash, as stated to the President, was completely within the twenty-seventh article of the treaty of amity, commerce, and navigation, entered into between the United States of America and Great Britain.

He read the article, and then observed: The casus fœderis of this article occurs, when a person, having committed murder or forgery within the jurisdiction of one of the contracting parties, and having sought an asylum in the country of the other, is charged with the crime, and his delivery demanded, on such proof of his guilt as, according to the laws of the place where he shall be found, would justify his apprehension and commitment for trial, if the offense had there been committed.

The case stated is, that Thomas Nash, having committed a murder on board a British frigate, navigating the high seas under a commission from His Britannic Majesty, had sought an asylum within the United States, and on this case his delivery was demanded by the minister of the King of Great Britain.

It is manifest that the case stated, if supported by proof, is within the letter of the article, provided a murder committed in a British frigate, on the high seas, be committed within the jurisdiction of that nation.

That such a murder is within their jurisdiction, has been fully shown by the gentleman from Delaware. The principle is, that the jurisdiction of a nation extends to the whole of its territory, and to its own citizens in every part of the world. The laws of a nation are rightfully obligatory on its own citizens in every situation, where those laws are really extended to them. This principle is founded on the nature of civil union. It is supported everywhere by public opinion, and is recognized by writers on the law of nations. Rutherford, in his second volume (p. 180), says: "The jurisdiction which a civil society has *over the [*5 persons of its members, affects them immediately, whether they are within its territories or not."

This general principle is especially true, and is particularly recognized with respect to the fleets of a nation on the high seas. To punish offenses committed in its fleet, is the practice of every nation in the universe; and consequently the opinion of the world is, that a fleet at sea is within the jurisdiction of the nation to which it belongs. Rutherford (Vol. II., p. 491), says: "There can be no doubt about the jurisdiction of a nation over the persons which compose its fleets, when they are out at sea, whether they are sailing upon it, or are stationed in any particular part of it."

The gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. Gallatin), though he has not directly controverted this doctrine, has sought to weaken it by observing that the jurisdiction of a nation at sea could not be complete even in its own vessels; and in support of this position, he urged the admitted practice of submitting to search for contraband; a practice not tolerated on land, within the territory of a neutral power. The rule is as stated, but is founded on a principle which does not affect the jurisdiction of a nation over its citizens or subjects in its ships. The principle is, that in the sea itself no nation has any jurisdiction. All may equally exercise their rights, and consequently the right of a belligerent power to prevent aid being given to his enemy, is not restrained by any superior right of a neutral in the place. But if this argument possessed any force, it would not apply to national ships of war, since the usage of nations does not permit them to be searched.

According to the practice of the world, then, and the opinions of writers on the law of nations, the murder committed on board a British frigate, navigating the high seas, was a murder committed within the jurisdiction of the British nation.

Although such a murder is plainly within the letter of the article, it has been contended not to be within its just construction; because, at sea, all nations have a common jurisdiction, and the article correctly construed, will not embrace a case of concurrent jurisdiction.

It is deemed unnecessary to controvert this [6*] construction, because *the proposition, that the United States had no jurisdiction over the murder committed by Thomas Nash, is believed to be completely demonstrable.

It is not true that all nations have jurisdiction over all offenses committed at sea. On the contrary, no nation has any jurisdiction at sea, but over its own citizens or vessels, or offenses against itself. This principle is laid down in 2 Ruth. 488, 491.

The American government has, on a very solemn occasion, avowed the same principle. The first minister of the French republic asserted and exercised powers of so extraordinary a nature as unavoidably to produce a controversy with the United States. The situation in which the government then found itself was such as necessarily to occasion a very serious and mature consideration of the opinions it should adopt. Of consequence, the opinions then declared deserve great respect. In the case alluded to, Mr. Genet had asserted the right of fitting out privateers in the American ports, and of manning them with American citizens, in order to cruise against nations with whom America was at peace. In reasoning against this extravagant claim, the then Secretary of State, in his letter of the 17th of June, 1793, says: "For our citizens, then, to commit murders and depredations on the members of nations at peace with us, or to combine to do it, appeared to the executive and to those whom they consulted, as much against the laws of the land as to murder or rob, or combine to murder or rob, its own citizens; and as much to require punishment, if done within their limits, where they have a territorial jurisdiction, or on the high seas, where they have a personal jurisdiction, that is to say, one which reaches their own citizens only; this being an appropriate part of each nation, on an element where all have a common jurisdiction."

The well-considered opinion, then, of the American government on this subject is, that the jurisdiction of a nation at sea is "personal," reaching its "own citizens only," and that this is "the appropriate part of each nation" on that element.

This is precisely the opinion maintained by the opposers of the resolutions. If the jurisdiction of America at sea be personal, reaching its own citizens only; if this be its appropriate [7*] part, then the jurisdiction of the nation cannot extend to a murder committed by a British sailor, on board a British frigate navigating the high seas, under a commission from His Britannic Majesty.

As a further illustration of the principle contended for, suppose a contract made at sea, and a suit instituted for the recovery of money which might be due thereon. By the laws of what nation would the contract be governed? The principle is general, that a personal contract follows the person, but is governed by the law of the place where it is formed. By what law, then, would such a contract be governed? If all nations had jurisdiction over the place, then the laws of all nations would equally influence the contract; but certainly no man will hesitate to admit that such a contract ought to be decided according to the laws of that nation to which the vessel or contracting parties might belong.

Suppose a duel attended with death, in the fleet of a foreign nation, or in any vessel which returned safe to port, could it be pretended that any government on earth, other than that to which the fleet or vessel belonged, had jurisdiction in the case; or that the offender could be tried by the laws or tribunals of any other nation whatever.

Suppose a private theft by one mariner from another, and the vessel to perform its voyage and return in safety, would it be contended that all nations have equal cognizance of the crime, and are equally authorized to punish it?

If there be this common jurisdiction at sea, why not punish desertion from one belligerent power to another, or correspondence with the enemy, or any other crime which may be perpetrated? A common jurisdiction over all offenses at sea, in whatever vessel committed, would involve the power of punishing the offenses which have been stated. Yet all gentlemen will disclaim this power. It follows, then, that no such common jurisdiction exists.

In truth, the right of every nation to punish is limited, in its nature, to offenses against the nation inflicting the punishment. This principle is believed to be universally true.

It comprehends every possible violation of its laws on its *own territory, and it extends [*8] to violations committed elsewhere by persons it has a right to bind. It extends also to general piracy.

A pirate, under the law of nations, is an enemy of the human race. Being the enemy of all, he is liable to be punished by all. Any act which denotes this universal hostility is an act of piracy. Not only an actual robbery therefore, but cruising on the high seas without commission, and with intent to rob, is piracy. This is an offense against all and every nation, and is therefore alike punishable by all. But an offense which in its nature affects only a particular nation, is only punishable by that nation.

It is by confounding general piracy with piracy by statute, that indistinct ideas have been produced, respecting the power to punish offenses committed on the high seas.

A statute may make any offense piracy, committed within the jurisdiction of the nation passing the statute, and such offense will be punishable by that nation. But piracy under the law of nations, which alone is punishable by all nations, can only consist in an act which is an offense against all. No particular nation can increase or diminish the list of offenses thus punishable.

It had been observed by his colleague (Mr. Nicholas), for the purpose of showing that the distinction taken on this subject by the gentleman from Delaware (Mr. Bayard) was inaccurate, that any vessel robbed on the high seas could be the property only of a single nation, and being only an offense against that nation, could be, on the principle taken by the opposers of the resolutions, no offense against the law of nations; but in this his colleague had not accurately considered the principle. As a man, who turns out to rob on the highway, and forces from a stranger his purse with a pistol at his bosom, is not the particular enemy of that stranger; but alike the enemy of every man who carries a purse, so those who, without a commission, rob on the high seas, manifest a temper hostile to all nations, and therefore become the enemies of all. The same inducements which occasion the robbery of one vessel, exist to occasion the robbery of others, and therefore 9*] the single offense is an offense *against the whole community of nations, manifests a temper hostile to all, is the commencement of an attack on all, and is consequently, of right, punishable by all.

His colleague had also contended, that all the offenses at sea, punishable by the British statutes, from which the act of Congress was in a great degree copied, were piracies at common law, or by the law of nations, and as murder is among these, consequently murder was an act of piracy by the law of nations, and therefore punishable by every nation. In support of this position, he had cited 1 Hawk., P. C. 267, 271; 3 Inst. 112, and 1 Woodeson, 140.

The amount of these cases is, that no new offense is made piracy by the statutes; but that a different tribunal is created for their trial, which is guided by a different rule from that which governed previous to those statutes. Therefore, on an indictment for piracy, it is still necessary to prove an offense which was piracy before the statutes. He drew from these authorities a very different conclusion from that which had been drawn by his colleague. To show the correctness of his conclusion, it was necessary to observe, that the statute did not, indeed, change the nature of piracy, since it only transferred the trial of the crime to a different tribunal, where different rules of decision prevailed; but having done this, other crimes committed on the high seas, which were not piracy, were made punishable by the same tribunal; but certainly this municipal regulation could not be considered as proving that those offenses were, before, piracy by the law of nations. Mr. Nicholas insisted that the law was not correctly stated; whereupon Mr. Marshall called for 3 Inst. and read the statute.

"All treasons, felonies, robberies, murders, and confederacies, committed in or upon the seas, &c., shall be inquired, tried, heard, determined and judged in such shires, &c., in like form and condition as if any such offense had been committed on the land, &c."

"And such as shall be convicted, &c., shall have and suffer such pains of death, &c., as if they had been attainted of any treason, felony, robbery, or other the said offenses done upon the land."

Wheat. 5.

*This statute, it is certain, does not [*10 change the nature of piracy; but all treasons, felonies, robberies, murders and confederacies committed in or upon the sea, are not declared to have been, nor are they, piracies. If a man be indicted as a pirate, the offense must be shown to have been piracy before the statute; but if he be indicted for treason, felony, robbery, murder, or confederacy committed at sea, whether such offense was or was not a piracy, he shall be punished in like manner as if he had committed the same offense on land. The passage cited from 1 Woodeson, 140, is a full authority to this point. Having stated that offenses committed at sea were formerly triable before the Lord High Admiral, according to the course of the Roman civil law, Woodeson says, "but by the statute 27 H. VIII., ch. 4, and 28 H. VIII., ch. 15, all treasons, felonies, piracies, and other crimes committed on the sea, or where the admiral has jurisdiction, shall be tried in the realm as if done on land. But the statutes referred to affect only the manner of the trial so far as respects piracy. The nature of the offense is not changed. Whether a charge amounts to piracy or not, must still depend on the law of nations, except where, in the case of British subjects, express acts of Parliament have declared that the crimes therein specified shall be adjudged piracy, or shall be liable to the same mode of trial and degree of punishment."

This passage proves not only that all offenses at sea are not piracies by the law of nations, but also that all indictments for piracy must depend on the law of nations, "except where, in the case of British subjects, express acts of Parliament have changed the law. Why do not these "express acts of Parliament" change the law as to others than "British subjects?" The words are general; "all treasons, felonies," &c. Why are they confined in construction to British subjects? The answer is a plain one. The jurisdiction of the nation is confined to its territory and to its subjects.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. Gallatin) abandons, and very properly abandons, this untenable ground. He admits that no nation has a right to punish offenses against another nation, and that the United States can only punish offenses against *their own [*11 laws, and the law of nations. He admits, too, that if there had only been a mutiny (and consequently if there had only been a murder) on board the Hermione, that the American courts could have taken no cognizance of the crime. Yet mutiny is punishable as piracy by the law of both nations. That gentleman contends that the act committed by Nash was piracy according to the law of nations. He supports his position by insisting that the offense may be constituted by the commission of a single act; that unauthorized robbery on the high seas is this act, and that the crew having seized the vessel, and being out of the protection of any nation, were pirates.

It is true that the offense may be completed by a single act; but it depends on the nature of that act. If it be such as manifests general hostility against the world—an intention to rob generally—then it is piracy; but if it be merely a mutiny and murder in a vessel, for the purpose of delivering it up to the enemy, it seems to be an offense against a single nation, and not to be piracy. The sole object of the crew might be to go over to the enemy, or to free themselves from the tyranny experienced on board a ship of war, and not to rob generally.

But should it even be true that running away with the vessel to deliver her up to an enemy was an act of general piracy, punishable by all nations, yet the mutiny and murder was a distinct offense. Had the attempt to seize the vessel failed after the commission of the murder, then, according to the argument of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, the American courts could have taken no cognizance of the crime. Whatever, then, might have been the law respecting the piracy, of the murder there was no jurisdiction. For the murder, not the piracy, Nash was delivered up. Murder, and not piracy, is comprehended in the twenty-seventh article of the treaty between the two nations. Had he been tried then, and acquitted on an indictment for the piracy, he must still have been delivered up for the murder, of which the court could have no jurisdiction. It is certain that an acquittal of the piracy would not have discharged the murder; and, therefore, in the so much relied on trials at Trenton, a separate indictment for murder was filed after an indictment for piracy. Since, then, if acquitted for piracy, he must have been delivered to the British government on the charge of murder, the President of the United States might, very properly, without prosecuting for the piracy, direct him to be delivered up on the murder.

All the gentlemen who have spoken in support of the resolutions, have contended that the case of Thomas Nash is within the purview of the act of Congress which relates to this subject, and is by that act made punishable in the American courts. This is, that the act of Congress designed to punish crimes committed on board a British frigate.

Nothing can be more completely demonstrable than the untruth of this proposition.

It has already been shown that the legislative jurisdiction of a nation extends only to its own territory, and to its own citizens, wherever they may be. Any general expression in a legislative act must, necessarily, be restrained to objects within the jurisdiction of the legislature passing the act. Of consequence, an act of Congress can only be construed to apply to the territory of the United States comprehending every person within it, and to the citizens of the United States.

But independent of this undeniable truth, the act itself affords complete testimony of its intention and extent. (See Laws of the U. S., Vol. I., p. 10.)

The title is, "An act for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States." Not against Britain, France, or the world, but singly "against the United States."

The first section relates to treason, and its objects are, "any person or persons owing allegiance to the United States." This description comprehends only the citizens of the United States, and such others as may be on its territory or in its service.

The second section relates to misprision of treason, and declares, without limitation, that any person or persons, having knowledge of any treason, and not communicating the same, shall be guilty of that crime. Here, then, is an instance of that limited description of persons in one section, and of that general description in another, which has been relied on to support the construction contended for by the friends of the resolutions. But will it be pretended that a person can commit misprision of *treason, who cannot commit treason it- [*13 self? That he would be punishable for concealing a treason, who could not be punished for plotting it? Or can it be supposed that the act designed to punish an Englishman or a Frenchman, who, residing in his own country, should have knowledge of treasons against the United States, and should not cross the Atlantic to reveal them?

The same observations apply to the sixth section, which makes "any person or persons" guilty of misprision of felony, who, having knowledge of murder or other offenses enumerated in that section, should conceal them. It is impossible to apply this to a foreigner, in a foreign land, or to any person not owing allegiance to the United States.

The eighth section, which is supposed to comprehend the case, after declaring, that if any person or persons shall commit murder on the high seas, he shall be punishable with death, proceeds to say, that if any captain or mariner shall piratically run away with a ship or vessel, or yield her up voluntarily to a pirate, or if any seaman shall lay violent hands on his commander, to prevent his fighting, or shall make a revolt in the ship, every such offender shall be adjudged a pirate and a felon.

The persons who are the objects of this section of the act are all described in general terms, which might embrace the subjects of all nations. But is it to be supposed, that if, in an engagement between an English and a French ship of war, the crew of the one or the other should lay violent hands on the captain, and force him to strike, that this would be an offense against the act of Congress, punishable in the courts of the United States? On this extended construction of the general terms of the section, not only the crew of one of the foreign vessels forcing their captain to surrender to another, would incur the penalties of the act, but if, in the late action between the gallant Truxton and a French frigate, the crew of that frigate had compelled the captain to surrender while he was unwilling to do so, they would have been indictable as felons in the courts of the United States. But surely the act of Congress admits of no such extravagant construction.

His colleague, Mr. Marshall said, had cited and particularly relied on the ninth section of the act. That section declares, *that if [*14 a citizen shall commit any of the enumerated piracies, or any act of hostility on the high seas against the United States, under color of a commission from any foreign prince or state, he shall be adjudged a pirate, felon, and robber, and shall suffer death.

This section is only a positive extension of the act to a case which might otherwise have escaped punishment. It takes away the protection of a foreign commission from an American citizen, who on the high seas robs his countrymen. This is no exception from any preceding part of the law, because there is no part which relates to the conduct of vessels commissioned by a foreign power; it only proves that, in the opinion of the legislature, the penalties of the act could not, without this express provision, have been incurred by a citizen holding a foreign commission.

It is then most certain that the act of Congress does not comprehend the case of a murder committed on board a foreign ship of war.

The gentleman from New York has cited 2 Woodeson, 428, to show that the courts of England extend their jurisdiction to piracies committed by the subjects of foreign nations.

This has not been doubted. The case from Woodeson is a case of robberies committed on the high seas by a vessel without authority. There are ordinary acts of piracy, which, as has been already stated, being offenses against all nations, are punishable by all. The case from 2 Woodeson, and the note cited from the same book, by the gentleman from Delaware, are strong authorities against the doctrines contended for by the friends of the resolutions.

It has also been contended, that the question of jurisdiction was decided at Trenton, by receiving indictments against persons there arraigned for the same offense, and by retaining them for trial after the return of the habeas corpus.

Every person in the slightest degree acquainted with judicial proceedings, knows that an indictment is no evidence of jurisdiction; and that in criminal cases, the question of jurisdiction will seldom be made but by arrest of judgment after conviction.

15*] *The proceedings after the return of the habeas corpus only prove that the case was not such a case as to induce the judge immediately to decide against his jurisdiction. The question was not free from doubt, and therefore might very properly be postponed until its decision should become necessary.

It has been argued by the gentleman from New York that the form of the indictment is, itself, evidence of a power in the court to try the case. Every word of that indictment, said the gentleman, gives the lie to a denial of the jurisdiction of the court.

It would be assuming a very extraordinary principle indeed, to say that words inserted in an indictment for the express purpose of assuming the jurisdiction of a court should be admitted to prove that jurisdiction. The question certainly depended on the nature of the fact, and not on the description of the fact. But as an indictment must necessarily contain formal words in order to be supported, and as forms often denote what a case must substantially be to authorize a court to take cognizance of it, some words in the indictments, at Trenton, ought to be noticed. The indictments charge the persons to have been within the peace, and the murder to have been committed against the peace, of the United States. These are necessary averments, and, to give the court jurisdiction, the fact ought to have accorded with them. But who will say that the crew of a British frigate on the high seas are within the peace of the United States, or a murder committed on board such a frigate against the peace of any other than the British government.

It is then demonstrated, that the murder with which Thomas Nash was charged was not committed within the jurisdiction of the United States, and, consequently, that the case stated was completely within the letter and the spirit of the twenty-seventh article of the treaty between the two nations. If the necessary evidence was produced, he ought to have been delivered up to justice. It was an act to which the American nation was bound by a most solemn compact. To have tried him for the murder would have been mere mockery. To have condemned and executed him, the court having no jurisdiction, would have been murder; to have acquitted and discharged him, would have been a breach of faith and a violation of national duty.

*But it has been contended, that al- [*16 though Thomas Nash ought to have been delivered up to the British minister, on the requisition made by him in the name of his government, yet the interference of the President was improper.

This, Mr. Marshall said, led to his second proposition, which was,

That the case was a case for executive and not judicial decision. He admitted implicitly the division of powers stated by the gentleman from New York, and that it was the duty of each department to resist the encroachments of the others.

This being established, the inquiry was, to what department was the power in question allotted?

The gentleman from New York had relied on the second section of the third article of the constitution, which enumerates the cases to which the judicial power of the United States extends, as expressly including that now under consideration. Before he examined that section, it would not be improper to notice a very material misstatement of it made in the resolutions offered by the gentleman from New York. By the constitution, the judicial power of the United States is extended to all cases in law and equity, arising under the constitution, laws and treaties of the United States; but the resolutions declare the judicial power to extend to all questions arising under the constitution, treaties and laws of the United States. The difference between the constitution and the resolutions was material and apparent. A case in law or equity was a term well understood, and of limited signification. It was a controversy between parties which had taken a shape for judicial decision. If the judicial power extended to every question under the constitution, it would involve almost every subject proper for legislative discussion and decision; if to every question under the laws and treaties of the United States, it would involve almost every subject on which the executive could act. The division of power which the gentleman had stated, could exist no longer, and the other departments would be swallowed up by the judiciary. But it was apparent that the resolutions had essentially misrepresented the constitution. He did not charge the gentleman from New York with intentional misrepresentation; he would not attribute to *him [*17 such an artifice in any case, much less in a case where detection was so easy and so certain. Yet this substantial departure from the constitution, in resolutions affecting substantially to unite it, was not less worthy of remark for being unintentional. It manifested the course of reasoning by which the gentleman had himself been misled, and his judgment betrayed into the opinions those resolutions expressed.

By extending the judicial power to all cases in law and equity, the constitution had never been understood to confer on that department any political power whatever. To come within this description, a question must assume a legal form for forensic litigation and judicial decision. There must be parties to come into court, who can be reached by its process, and bound by its power; whose rights admit of ultimate decision by a tribunal to which they are bound to submit.

A case in law or equity proper for judicial decision may arise under a treaty, where the rights of individuals acquired or secured by a treaty are to be asserted or defended in court. As under the fourth or sixth article of the treaty of peace with Great Britain, or under those articles of our late treaties with France, Prussia, and other nations, which secure to the subjects of those nations their property within the United States; or, as would be an article which, instead of stipulating to deliver up an offender, should stipulate his punishment, provided the case was punishable by the laws and in the courts of the United States. But the judicial power cannot extend to political compacts; as, the establishment of the boundary line between the American and British dominions; the case of the late guarantee in our treaty with France, or the case of the delivery of a murderer under the twenty-seventh article of our present treaty with Britain.

The gentleman from New York has asked, triumphantly asked, what power exists in our courts to deliver up an individual to a foreign government? Permit me, said Mr. Marshall, but not triumphantly, to retort the question—By what authority can any court render such a judgment? What power does a court possess to seize any individual, and determine that he [18*] shall be *adjudged by a foreign tribunal? Surely our courts possess no such power, yet they must possess it, if this article of the treaty is to be executed by the courts.

Gentlemen have cited and relied on that clause in the constitution which enables Congress to define and punish piracies and felonies committed on the high seas, and offenses against the law of nations, together with the act of Congress declaring the punishment of those offenses, as transferring the whole subject to the courts. But that clause can never be construed to make to the government a grant of power, which the people making it did not themselves possess. It has already been shown that the people of the United States have no jurisdiction over offenses committed on board a foreign ship against a foreign nation. Of consequence, in framing a government for themselves, they cannot have passed this jurisdiction to that government. The law, therefore, cannot act upon the case. But this clause of the constitution cannot be considered, and need not be considered, as affecting acts which are piracy under the law of nations. As the judicial power of the United States extends to all cases of admiralty and marine jurisdiction, and piracy under the law of nations is of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, punishable by every nation, the judicial power of the United States, of course, extends to it. On this principle the courts of admiralty under the confederation took cognizance of piracy, although there was no express power in Congress to define and punish the offense.

But the extension of the judicial power of the United States to all cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction must necessarily be understood with some limitation. All cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction which, from their nature, are triable in the United States, are submitted to the jurisdiction of the courts of the United States. There are cases of piracy by the law of nations, and cases within the legislative jurisdiction of the nation. The people of America possessed no other power over the subject, and could, consequently, transfer no other to their courts; and it has already been proved, that a murder committed on board a foreign ship of war is not comprehended within this description.

The consular convention with France has also been relied on, as proving the act of [*19] delivering up an individual to a foreign power, to be in its nature judicial, and not executive.

The ninth article of that convention authorizes the consuls and vice-consuls of either nation to cause to be arrested all deserters from their vessels, "for which purpose the said consuls and vice-consuls shall address themselves to the courts, judges, and officers competent."

This article of the convention does not, like the twenty-seventh article of the treaty with Britain, stipulate a national act, to be performed on the demand of a nation; it only authorizes a foreign minister to cause an act to be done, and prescribes the course he is to pursue. The contract itself is, that the act shall be performed by the agency of the foreign consul, through the medium of the courts; but this affords no evidence that a contract of a very different nature is to be performed in the same manner.

It is said that the then President of the United States declared the incompetency of the courts, judges, and officers, to execute this contract, without an act of the legislature. But the then President made no such declaration. He has said that some legislative provision is requisite to carry the stipulations of the convention into full effect. This, however, is by no means declaring the incompetency of a department to perform an act stipulated by treaty, until the legislative authority shall direct its performance.

It has been contended, that the conduct of the executive on former occasions, similar to this in principle, has been such as to evince an opinion, even in that department, that the case in question is proper for the decision of the courts.

The fact adduced to support this argument, is the determination of the late President on the case of prizes made within the jurisdiction of the United States, or by privateers fitted out in their ports.

The nation was bound to deliver up those prizes, in like manner as the nation is now bound to deliver up an individual demanded under the twenty-seventh article of the treaty with Britain. The duty was the same, and devolved on the same department.

*In quoting the decision of the execu- [*20]

tive on that case, the gentleman from New York has taken occasion to bestow a high encomium on the late President, and to consider his conduct as furnishing an example worthy the imitation of his successor.

It must be cause of much delight to the real friends of that great man, to those who supported his administration while in office from a conviction of its wisdom and its virtue, to hear the unqualified praise which is now bestowed on it by those who had been supposed to possess different opinions. If the measure now under consideration shall be found, on examination, to be the same in principle with that which has been cited by its opponents as a fit precedent for it, then may the friends of the gentleman now in office indulge the hope, that when he, like his predecessor, shall be no more, his conduct, too, may be quoted as an example for the government of his successors.

The evidence relied on to prove the opinion of the then executive on the case, consists of two letters from the Secretary of State—the one of the 29th of June, 1793, to Mr. Genet, and the other of the 16th of August, 1793, to Mr. Morris.

In the letter to Mr. Genet, the Secretary says, that the claimant having filed his libel against the ship William in the Court of Admiralty, there was no power which could take the vessel out of court until it had decided against its own jurisdiction; that having so decided, the complaint is lodged with the executive, and he asks for evidence to enable that department to consider and decide finally on the subject.

It will be difficult to find in this letter an executive opinion, that the case was not a case for executive decision. The contrary is clearly avowed. It is true, that when an individual claiming the property as his, had asserted that claim in court, the executive acknowledges in itself a want of power to dismiss or decide upon the claim thus pending in court. But this argues no opinion of a want of power in itself to decide upon the case, if, instead of being carried before a court as an individual claim, it is brought before the executive as a national demand. A private suit instituted by an individual, asserting his claim to property, can only be controlled by that individual. The executive can give no direction concerning it. But a public prosecution, *carried on in the name of the United States, can without impropriety be dismissed at the will of the government. The opinion, therefore, given in this letter is unquestionably correct; but it is certainly misunderstood, when it is considered as being an opinion that the question was not in its nature a question for executive decision.

In the letter to Mr. Morris, the secretary asserts the principle, that vessels taken within our jurisdiction ought to be restored, but says it is yet unsettled whether the act of restoration is to be performed by the executive or judicial department.

The principle, then, according to this letter, is not submitted to the courts—whether a vessel captured within a given distance of the American coast was or was not captured within the jurisdiction of the United States, was a question not to be determined by the courts, but by the executive. The doubt expressed is, not what tribunal shall settle the principle, but what tribunal shall settle the fact. In this respect a doubt might exist in the case of prizes, which could not exist in the case of a man. Individuals on each side claimed the property, and therefore their rights could be brought into court, and there contested as a case in law or equity. The demand of a man made by a nation stands on different principles.

Having noticed the particular letters cited by the gentleman from New York, permit me now, said Mr. Marshall, to ask the attention of the house to the whole course of executive conduct on this interesting subject.

It is first mentioned, in a letter from the Secretary of State to Mr. Genet, of the 25th of June, 1793. In that letter, the secretary states a consultation between himself and the secretaries of the treasury and war (the President being absent), in which (so well were they assured of the President's way of thinking in those cases) it was determined, that the vessels should be detained in the custody of the consuls in the ports, "until the government of the United States shall be able to inquire into, and decide on the fact."

In his letter of the 12th of July, 1793, the secretary writes, the President has determined to refer the questions concerning prizes "to persons learned in the laws." And he requests that "certain vessels enumerated in the [*22] letter should not depart "until his ultimate determination shall be made known."

In his letter of the 7th of August, 1793, the secretary informs Mr. Genet, that the President considers the United States as bound "to effectuate the restoration of, or to make compensation for, prizes which shall have been made of any of the parties at war with France, "subsequent to the 5th day of June last, by "privateers fitted out of our ports." That it is consequently expected that Mr. Genet will cause restitution of such prizes to be made. And that the United States "will cause restitution" to be made "of all such prizes as shall be hereafter "brought within their ports by any of the said "privateers."

In his letter of the 10th of November, 1793, the secretary informs Mr. Genet, that, for the purpose of obtaining testimony to ascertain the fact of capture within the jurisdiction of the United States, the governors of the several states were requested, on receiving any such claim, immediately to notify thereof the attorneys of their several districts, whose duty it would be to give notice "to the principal agent of both parties, "and also to the consuls of the nations interested, and to recommend to them to appoint by "mutual consent arbiters to decide whether the "capture was made within the jurisdiction of "the United States, as stated in my letter of "the 8th instant, according to whose award the "governor may proceed to deliver the vessel "to the one or the other party." "If either "party refuse to name arbiters, then the attorney is to take depositions on notice, which he "is to transmit for the information and decision "of the President." "This prompt procedure "is the more to be insisted on, as it will enable "the President, by an immediate delivery of "the vessel and cargo to the party having title, "to prevent the injuries consequent on long "delay."

In his letter of the 22d of November, 1793, the secretary repeats, in substance, his letter of the 12th of July and 7th of August, and says, that the determination to deliver up certain vessels, involved the brig Jane, of Dublin, the brig Lovely Lass, and the brig Prince William Henry. He concludes with saying: "I have it in charge to inquire of you, sir, whether these three brigs have been given up according to 23*] "the determination *of the President, "and if they have not, to repeat the requisition "that they may be given up to their former "owners."

Ultimately it was settled that the fact should be investigated in the courts, but the decision was regulated by the principles established by the executive department.

The decision, then, on the case of vessels captured within the American jurisdiction, by privateers fitted out of the American ports, which the gentleman from New York has cited with such merited approbation; and which he has declared to stand on the same principles with those which ought to have governed in the case of Thomas Nash; which deserves the more respect, because the government of the United States was then so circumstanced as to assure us, that no opinion was lightly taken up, and no resolution formed but on mature consideration. This decision, quoted as a precedent, and pronounced to be right, is found, on fair and full examination, to be precisely and unequivocally the same with that which was made in the case under consideration. It is a full authority to show, that, in the opinion always held by the American government, a case like that of Thomas Nash is a case for executive, and not judicial decision.

The clause in the constitution, which declares, that "the trial of all crimes, except in "cases of impeachment, shall be by jury," has also been relied on as operating on the case, and transferring the decision on a demand for the delivery of an individual from the executive to the judicial department.

But certainly this clause in the constitution of the United States cannot be thought obligatory on, and for the benefit of, the whole world. It is not designed to secure the rights of the people of Europe and Asia, or to direct and control proceedings against criminals throughout the universe. It can then be designed only to guide the proceedings of our own courts, and to prescribe the mode of punishing offenses committed against the government of the United States, and to which the jurisdiction of the nation may rightfully extend.

It has already been shown, that the courts of the United States were incapable of trying the crime for which Thomas Nash was delivered up to justice; the question to be determined was, not how his crime should be tried and 24*] punished, but whether he *should be delivered up to a foreign tribunal which was alone capable of trying and punishing him. A provision for the trial of crimes in the courts of the United States, is clearly not a provision for the performance of a national compact for the surrender to a foreign government of an offender against that government.

The clause of the constitution declaring that the trial of all crimes shall be by jury, has never even been construed to extend to the trial of crimes committed in the land and naval forces of the United States. Had such a construction prevailed, it would most probably have prostrated the constitution itself, with the liberties and the independence of the nation, before the first disciplined invader who should approach our shores. Necessity would have imperiously demanded the review and amendment of so unwise a provision. If, then, this clause does not extend to offenses committed in the fleets and armies of the United States, how can it be construed to extend to offenses committed in the fleets and armies of Britain or of France, or of the Ottoman or Russian empires?

The same argument applies to the observations on the seventh article of the amendments to the constitution. That article relates only to trials in the courts of the United States, and not to the performance of a contract for the delivery of a murder not triable in those courts.

In this part of the argument, the gentleman from New York has presented a dilemma of a very wonderful structure indeed. He says that the offense of Thomas Nash was either a crime or not a crime. If it was a crime, the constitutional mode of punishment ought to have been observed. If it was not a crime, he ought not have been delivered up to a foreign government, where his punishment was inevitable.

It had escaped the observation of that gentleman, that if the murder committed by Thomas Nash was a crime, yet it was not a crime provided for by the constitution, or triable in the courts of the United States; and that if it was not a crime, yet it is the precise case in which his surrender was stipulated by treaty. Of this extraordinary dilemma, then, the gentleman from New York is, himself, perfectly at liberty to retain either form.

*The gentleman is incorrect in every part [*25 of his statement. Murder on board a British frigate is not a crime created by treaty. It would have been a crime of precisely the same magnitude, had the treaty never been formed. It is not punished by sending the offender out of the United States. The experience of this unfortunate criminal, who was hung and gibbeted, evinced to him that the punishment of his crime was of a much more serious nature than mere banishment from the United States.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania and the gentleman from Virginia have both contended, that this was a case proper for the decision of the courts, because points of law occurred, and points of law must have been decided in its determination.

The points of law which must have been decided are stated by the gentleman from Pennsylvania to be, first, a question whether the offense was committed within the British jurisdiction; and, secondly, whether the crime charged was comprehended within the treaty.

It is true, sir, these points of law must have occurred, and must have been decided; but it by no means follows, that they could only have been decided in court. A variety of legal questions must present themselves in the performance of every part of executive duty, but these questions are not therefore to be decided in court. Whether a patent for land shall issue or not is always a question of law, but not a question which must necessarily be carried into court. The gentleman from Pennsylvania seems to have permitted himself to have been misled by the misrepresentation of the constitution made in the resolutions of the gentleman from New York; and, in consequence of being so misled, his observations have the appearance of endeavoring to fit the constitution to his arguments, instead of adapting his arguments to the constitution.

When the gentleman has proved that these are questions of law, and that they must have been decided by the President, he has not advanced a single step toward proving that they were improper for executive decision. The questions whether vessels captured within three miles of the American coast, or by privateers 26*] *fitted out in the American ports, were legally captured or not, and whether the American government was bound to restore them, if in its power, were questions of law, but they were questions of political law, proper to be decided, and they were decided by the executive, and not by the courts.

The casus federis of the guaranty was a question of law, but no man would have hazarded the opinion that such a question must be carried into court, and can only be there decided. So the casus federis under the twenty-seventh article of the treaty with Britain is a question of law, but of political law. The question to be decided is, whether the particular case proposed be one in which the nation has bound itself to act, and this is a question depending on principles never submitted to courts.

If a murder should be committed within the United States, and the murderer should seek an asylum in Britain, the question whether the casus federis of the twenty-seventh article had occurred, so that his delivery ought to be demanded, would be a question of law, but no man would say it was a question which ought to be decided in the courts.

When, therefore, the gentleman from Pennsylvania has established, that in delivering up Thomas Nash, points of law were decided by the President he has established a position which in no degree whatever aids his argument.

The case was in its nature a national demand made upon the nation. The parties were the two nations. They cannot come into court to litigate their claims, nor can a court decide on them. Of consequence, the demand is not a case for judicial cognizance.

The President is the sole organ of the nation in its external relations, and its sole representative with foreign nations. Of consequence, the demand of a foreign nation can only be made on him.

He possesses the whole executive power. He holds and directs the force of the nation. Of consequence, any act to be performed by the force of the nation is to be performed through him.

He is charged to execute the laws. A treaty is declared to be a law. He must then execute a treaty, where he, and he alone, possesses the means of executing it.

27*] *The treaty, which is a law, enjoins the performance of a particular object. The person who is to perform this object is marked out by the constitution, since the person is named who conducts the foreign intercourse, and is to take care that the laws be faithfully executed. The means by which it is to be performed—the force of the nation—are in the hands of this person. Ought not this person to perform the object, although the particular mode of using the means has not been prescribed? Congress unquestionably may prescribe the mode; and Congress may devolve on others the whole execution of the contract; but till this be done, it seems the duty of the executive department to execute the contract by any means it possesses.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania contends that, although this should be properly an executive duty, yet it cannot be performed until Congress shall direct the mode of performance. He says, that although the jurisdiction of the courts is extended by the constitution to all cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, yet if the courts had been created without any express assignment of jurisdiction, they could not have taken cognizance of causes expressly allotted to them by the constitution. The executive, he says, can, no more than courts, supply a legislative omission.

It is not admitted that in the case stated, courts could not have taken jurisdiction. The contrary is believed to be the correct opinion. And although the executive cannot supply a total legislative omission, yet it is not admitted or believed that there is such a total omission in this case.

The treaty, stipulating that a murderer shall be delivered up to justice, is as obligatory as an act of Congress making the same declaration. If, then, there was an act of Congress in the words of the treaty, declaring that a person who had committed murder within the jurisdiction of Britain, and sought an asylum within the territory of the United States, should be delivered up by the United States, on the demand of His Britannic Majesty, and such evidence of his criminality as would have justified his commitment for trial, had the offense been here committed; could the President, who is bound to execute the laws, have justified a *refusal to deliver up the criminal, by [*28 saying that the legislature had totally omitted to provide for the case.

The executive is not only the constitutional department, but seems to be the proper department to which the power in question may most wisely and most safely be confided.

The department which is entrusted with the whole foreign intercourse of the nation, with the negotiation of all its treaties, with the power of demanding a reciprocal performance of the article, which is accountable to the nation for the violation of its engagements with foreign nations, and for the consequences resulting from such violation, seems the proper department to be entrusted with the execution of a national contract like that under consideration.

If at any time policy may temper the strict execution of the contract, where may that political discretion be placed so safely as in the department whose duty it is to understand precisely the state of the political intercourse and connection between the United States and foreign nations, to understand the manner in which the particular stipulation is explained and performed by foreign nations, and to understand completely the state of the Union?

This department, too, independent of judicial aid, which may, perhaps, in some instances be called in, is furnished with a great law-officer, whose duty it is to understand and to advise when the casus fœderis occurs. And if the President should cause to be arrested under the treaty an individual who was so circumstanced as not to be properly the object of such an arrest, he may perhaps bring the question of the legality of his arrest before a judge by a writ of habeas corpus.

It is then demonstrated, that according to the practice, and according to the principles of the American government, the question whether the nation has or has not bound itself to deliver up any individual, charged with having committed murder or forgery within the jurisdiction of Britain, is a question, the power to decide which rests alone with the executive department.

It remains to inquire, whether in exercising this power, and in performing the duty it enjoins, the President has committed *an unauthorized and dangerous interference with judicial decisions.

That Thomas Nash was committed originally at the instance of the British consul at Charleston, not for trial in the American courts, but for the purpose of being delivered up to justice in conformity with the treaty between the two nations, has been already so ably argued by the gentleman from Delaware, that nothing further can be added to that point. He would, therefore, Mr. Marshall said, consider the case as if Nash, instead of having been committed for the purposes of the treaty, had been committed for trial. Admitting even this to have been the fact, the conclusions which have been drawn from it were by no means warranted.

Gentlemen had considered it as an offense against judicial authority, and a violation of judicial rights, to withdraw from their sentence a criminal against whom a prosecution had been commenced. They had treated the subject as if it was the privilege of courts to condemn to death the guilty wretch arraigned at their bar, and that to intercept the judgment was to violate the privilege. Nothing can be more incorrect than this view of the case. It is not the privilege, it is the sad duty of courts to administer criminal judgment. It is a duty to be performed at the demand of the nation, and with which the nation has a right to dispense. If judgment of death is to be pronounced, it must be at the prosecution of the nation, and the nation may at will stop that prosecution. In this respect the President expresses constitutionally the will of the nation, and may rightfully, as was done in the case at Trenton, enter a nolle prosequi, or direct that the criminal be prosecuted no further. This is no interference with judicial decisions, nor any invasion of the province of a court. It is the exercise of an indubitable and a constitutional power. Had the President directed the judge at Charleston to decide for or against his own jurisdiction, to condemn or acquit the prisoner, this would have been a dangerous interference with judicial decisions, and ought to have been resisted. But no such direction has been given, nor any such decision been required. If the President determined that Thomas Nash ought to have been delivered up to the British government *for a murder [*30 committed on board a British frigate, provided evidence of the fact was adduced, it was a question which duty obliged him to determine, and which he determined rightly. If in consequence of this determination he arrested the proceedings of a court on a national prosecution, he had a right to arrest and to stop them, and the exercise of this right was a necessary consequence of the determination of the principal question. In conforming to this decision, the court has left open the question of its jurisdiction. Should another prosecution of the same sort be commenced, which should not be suspended but continued by the executive, the case of Thomas Nash would not bind as a precedent against the jurisdiction of the court. If it should even prove that in the opinion of the executive, a murder committed on board a foreign fleet was not within the jurisdiction of the court, it would prove nothing more; and though this opinion might rightfully induce the executive to exercise its power over the prosecution, yet if the prosecution was continued, it would have no influence with the court in deciding on its jurisdiction.

Taking the fact, then, even to be as the gentleman in support of the resolutions would state it, the fact cannot avail them.

It is to be remembered, too, that in the case stated to the President, the judge himself appears to have considered it as proper for executive decision, and to have wished that decision. The President and judge seem to have entertained on this subject the same opinion; and in consequence of the opinion of the judge, the application was made to the President.

It has then been demonstrated:

1st. The case of Thomas Nash, as stated to the President, was completely within the twenty-seventh article of the treaty between the United States of America and Great Britain.

2d. That this question was proper for executive and not for judicial decision; and,

3d. That in deciding it, the President is not chargeable with an interference with judicial decisions.

After trespassing so long, Mr. Marshall said, on the patience of the house, in arguing what had appeared to him to be the *material [*31 points growing out of the resolutions; he regretted the necessity of detaining them still longer for the purpose of noticing an observation, which appeared not to be considered by the gentleman who made it as belonging to the argument.

The subject introduced by this observation, however, was so calculated to interest the public feelings, that he must be excused for stating his opinion on it.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania had said, that an impressed American seaman, who should commit homicide for the purpose of liberating himself from the vessel in which he was confined, ought not to be given up as a murderer. In this, Mr. Marshall said, he concurred entirely with that gentleman. He believed the opinion to be unquestionably correct, as were the reasons that gentleman had given in support of it. He had never heard any American avow a contrary sentiment, nor did he believe a contrary sentiment could find a place in the bosom of any American. He could not pretend, and did not pretend, to know the opinion of the executive on the subject, because he had never heard the opinions of that department; but he felt the most perfect conviction, founded on the general conduct of the government, that it could never surrender an impressed American to the nation, which, in making the impressment, had committed a national injury.

This belief was in no degree shaken by the conduct of the executive in this particular case.

In his own mind, it was a sufficient defense of the President from an imputation of this kind, that the fact of Thomas Nash being an impressed American was obviously not contemplated by him in the decision he made on the principles of the case. Consequently, if a new circumstance occurred, which would essentially change the case decided by the President, the judge ought not to have acted under that decision, but the new circumstance ought to have been stated. Satisfactory as this defense might appear, he should not resort to it, because to some it might seem a subterfuge. He defended the conduct of the President on other and still stronger ground.

The President had decided that a murder committed on board a British frigate on the high seas was within the jurisdiction of that 32*] *nation, and consequently within the twenty-seventh article of its treaty with the United States. He therefore directed Thomas

Nash to be delivered to the British minister, if satisfactory evidence of the murder should be adduced. The sufficiency of the evidence was submitted entirely to the judge. If Thomas Nash had committed a murder, the decision was, that he should be surrendered to the British minister; but if he had not committed a murder, he was not to be surrendered.

Had Thomas Nash been an impressed American, the homicide on board the Hermoine would, most certainly, not have been a murder.

The act of impressing an American is an act of lawless violence. The confinement on board a vessel is a continuation of that violence, and an additional outrage. Death committed within the United States, in resisting such violence, would not have been murder, and the person giving the wound could not have been treated as a murderer. Thomas Nash was only to have been delivered up to justice on such evidence as, had the fact been committed within the United States, would have been sufficient to have induced his commitment and trial for murder. Of consequence, the decision of the President was so expressed as to exclude the case of an impressed American liberating himself by homicide.

He concluded with observing, that he had already too long availed himself of the indulgence of the house to venture further on that indulgence, by recapitulating, or reinforcing, the arguments which had already been urged.

[NOTE II.]

ON THE LAWS OF LOUISIANA.

In a note to a former volume of these reports (Vol. III., p. 202, note 1), the editor attempted to give a slight sketch of the sources from which the local laws of Louisiana have been derived. 33*] *From that statement, the learned reader will perceive, that they mainly spring from the Spanish law, with the following valuable history of which, the editor has been favored by Mr. Alexander Porter, Jun., of Attakapas, in the state of Louisiana, by whom it was translated and compiled from the original Spanish writers. The editor has taken the liberty of subjoining a few explanatory remarks to those made by Mr. Porter, and intended to illustrate the facts stated in the history.

History of the Spanish Law.

The laws of Spain, in common with all the kingdoms of modern Europe, seem to have suffered a variety of changes, in the revolutions that took place at different times in her government, and in the gradual advances that the nation made from barbarism and poverty, to the comparative wealth and civilization, which distinguish her present condition. Spain, while a part of the Roman Empire, was governed, like all the other provinces, by the laws of Rome; and those principles of jurisprudence which now preserve their influence there, from the superiority of their wisdom, and the respect which is due to the immutable dictates of justice and truth on which they are founded, once had force and authority, from being promulgated and acted on by the ruling power of the state.<sup>1</sup>

On the conquest of Spain by the Goths, it

1.—No one can contemplate without emotion the great fortune and fame of the Roman people. "Comme si les grandes destinées de Rome n'étoient pas encore accomplies: Elle règne dans toute la terre par sa raison, après avoir cessé d'y régner par son autorité. On droit en effet que la justice n'ait dévoilé pleinement ses mystères qu'aux Jurisconsultes Romains. Législateurs encore plus que Jurisconsultes, de simples particuliers dans l'obscurité d'une vie privée ont mérité par la supériorité de leurs lumières de donner des loix à toute la postérité." Wheat. 5.

rité. Lois aussi entendues que durables toutes les nations les interrogent encore à présent et chacune en reçoit des réponses d'une éternelle vérité. C'est peu pour eux d'avoir interprété la loi de douze tables et l'édit du Préteur, ils sont les plus sûrs interprètes de nos lois memes; ils pretent, pour ainsi dire, leur esprit à nos usages, leur raison à nos coutumes, et par les principes qu'ils nous donnent, ils nous servent de guides lors meme que nous marchons dans une route qui leur étoit inconnue." Œuvres de d'Aguesseau, tome 1, p. 157, ed. 1787.

may be readily supposed, that a barbarous people, such as we know them to have been, were badly calculated to relish or adopt laws befitting 34* the condition of a rich and polished people. Hence we find on the establishment of these invaders in that country, the Imperial or Roman jurisprudence fell immediately into disuse; and for a considerable period after the conquest, the usages and customs of the Goths were the only rule of action. A settled residence, however, in the country, producing a state of society widely different from the migrating and ever changing condition to which they had formerly been accustomed, created the necessity of something better calculated to meet the wants of their new situation; and laws and decrees of various kinds began to be passed at their national councils. At these meetings the clergy assisted; and it may readily be conceived, from their education and ability, that they were the sole persons in those ages capable of putting them in a shape by which they could be transmitted to posterity.

From these decisions of their national councils, and from various edicts of the Gothic kings, a work was promulgated in the 693d year of the Christian era, which bears the name of "Fuero Juzgo."<sup>1</sup> This first code of the nation was divided into twelve books, and subdivided into various titles. The first books treated of the elections of kings,<sup>2</sup> and of legis- 35* lators, and the *mode of passing laws.<sup>3</sup> The second, of judges, civil judgments, and the manner of prosecuting actions. The third, of marriages, successions, &c. The fourth and fifth, of the alienation of property belonging to the church, donations, contracts. The three following books are occupied with criminal law; the form of accusations, and the penalties attached to various crimes. The ninth contains the rules respecting fugitive slaves, deserters, &c. The tenth treats of partitions of lands, prescriptions. The eleventh, of the violation of sepulchres, of the sick, of physicians, of merchants. In the twelfth and last, of equity, of heretics, and of injuries.

This code, say the Spanish writers, though excellent in many of its parts, was better calculated for an elective monarchy than for that which now exists in Spain; and more conformable to the necessities of a warlike people, among whom, arts, agriculture, and commerce, had made little progress, than to a nation which (according to them) has made such eminent progress in them all.

*This code, however defective it may [36 have been, formed the political constitution of the kingdom, until the invasion of the Moors in the year 714 nearly annihilated the Spanish Monarchy. The Goths who saved themselves from the storm were obliged to retire to the mountains of Asturias. Cooped up in this narrow part of the kingdom, and engaged in continual wars waged with their invaders to preserve their existence, or extend their dominions, it is not to be presumed that the improvement of their laws could occupy much of their attention, or any great progress be made in a science which owes a great part of its perfection in every country to the quiet and blessings of peace. Accordingly, we find that during the time the monarchy remained in that situation, their government and their laws partook in a great measure of that feudal system which about this period began to obtain so much force in all the countries of Europe, acting in some with more, and in others with less vigor, according as the circumstances of the particular country were in a greater or less degree favorable to its progress. The king, it appears, during this period, on making conquests from the Moors, distributed the lands among the nobles who assisted him in person and with their vassals during the wars. To the large cities and towns, various privileges were extended from time to time, as they were

1.—This is among the earliest, though not the first code, published by those nations who, after destroying the Roman Empire, settled themselves in the south of Europe. The most ancient is the Salic law, thought to derive its appellation from the Salians, who inhabited the country from the Leser to the Carbonian wood, on the confines of Brabant and Hainault. It was written in the Latin language, about the beginning of the fifth century, by Wisogastus, Bordogastus, Sologastus, and Widowgastus, chiefs of the nation. The Burgundian and Ripuarian codes are nearly of as great antiquity. That of the Lombards, the most famous of all the systems of laws published by those barbarians, was written in Teutonic Latin, in the 643d year of the Christian era, about half a century before the "Fuero Juzgo." This first effort of Spain in jurisprudence is totally overlooked, or rather seems to have been unknown to Butler, the learned author of the Horæ Juridicæ. Gibbon observes of this code, that it had been treated by the President Montesquieu (Esprit des Loix, l. 28, c. 1) with excessive severity. But he (Gibbon) says of it: "I dislike the style; I detest the superstition; but I shall presume to think, that the civil jurisprudence displays a more civilized and enlightened state of society than that of the Burgundians, or even of the Lombards." Gibbon's Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire, Vol. VI., c. 38, note 125.

2.—In Castile, the people, or rather the nobility, asserted the right of trying and deposing their kings; in Castile and Arragon, the kings were long elective; and in all the Gothic monarchies of Spain, the power of the crown was extremely limited. Robertson, Hist. of Charles V., Vol. I., sec. 3, notes 31, 32, 33.

3.—The legislative authority in the Spanish monarchy was long vested jointly in the King and the Cortes, the latter consisting of the nobility, the dignified clergy, and the deputies or procuradores of the cities and towns. Even after the Cortes ceased to be regularly assembled, and the government assumed the form of an absolute monarchy, it continued to be the usage to convene the Cortes in the life-time of the reigning king, in order that they might take an oath of fidelity to his eldest son as heir-apparent of the crown. This ceremony was performed during the reign of the late King, Charles IV., in 1788, when the Cortes were assembled for the sole purpose of swearing fidelity to his son, Ferdinand VII., the present monarch. Under the ancient constitution, no duties or taxes could be exacted from the cities and towns except what were freely granted in Cortes by the deputies of these communities. The law establishing this privilege was enacted in 1328, not many years after the celebrated English statute de tallagio non concedendo, securing the same right to the English people. "It is a curious fact, that this law, though violated in practice, was still retained in the Spanish Recopilacion till the reign of Charles IV., when it was expunged in the insolence of despotism, within a few years of that revolution which precipitated the degraded monarch from his throne, and restored to his people, not that only, but all the ancient rights of their fathers." The constitution which was established in consequence of this revolution, was abolished by Ferdinand VII. on his return to Spain in 1814; but has again been restored by another revolution, the accounts of which have just reached us; and which, it is to be hoped, may establish the liberties of the Spanish people on a permanent basis.

conquered and annexed to the Spanish Monarchy.<sup>1</sup>

This change of situation in the condition of the people, the increase of power given to the nobles by the division of conquered lands, and the privileges extended to the cities, created a necessity for new regulations. Accordingly, in the year 992, a code was published entitled Fuero Viejo. This work was divided into five books, each comprehending various titles. The first contained the laws by which the extent of the relative duties flowing from the king to the people, and from the people to the king, were ascertained; the obligation of vassals to their lords, and the extent of protection which the latter owed to the former; rules for the 37* government of judicial *combats; the prohibition of the use of armed force by individuals; of vassals attached to the soil; of the inhabitants of free towns and their laws; and concludes with a title of the penalties inflicted on the powerful (Los Poderosos) who vexed or oppressed their vassals in towns by unjustly seizing their provisions from them. In the second book, were included the penal laws against various classes of crimes. In the third, titles directing the formalities which parties should observe who present their plaints in justice; of the various kinds of proofs and sentences; and this book concludes with titles which treat of debts and suretyship. In the fourth are given the laws which govern contracts; the manner of acquiring the dominion of things; of public works, and the construction of mills. In the fifth and last are found dispositions relative to the portion settled by the husband on his wife ("Las Arras"), inheritances, partition of lands which were given to rent; and it concludes with the titles appertaining to tutors, disinheritances, legitimate and illegitimate children, with an appendix to the whole.

In this work, say the modern Spanish writers, were found the same defects as in the "Fuero Juzgo." There is the same want of good and wholesome regulations for the protection of agriculture, arts and commerce; and the various titles which speak of judicial combats, the use of armed force by private individuals, with various regulations of a similar nature, plainly show, that the king at this period had not sufficient power to curb the haughty and licentious nobles, and restrain their actions within limits compatible with private security and public order.

A knowledge, however, of this code is even now considered as highly necessary in that country to those who aspire to the exalted ranks of their profession; it being regarded as eminently useful to the perfect understanding of many modern laws which treat of vassalage—the dominion of things considered as appendages to landed estate—the prerogatives of nobles, grandees, &c.

However justly this code of laws, as well as that of the "Fuero Juzgo," may be entitled to the censure of the Spanish writers of the present day, and although provisions compatible with such a state of society as then existed would be found *totally inconsistent [*38 with the well being of any of the kingdoms of modern Europe, yet it may be questioned if any other of the nations at present existing in that portion of the globe can boast of codes of equal antiquity and value; and from the date of the promulgation of them it would appear that while England and the other nations of Europe were yet in the darkest stages of confusion and ignorance, Spain, by reducing her laws to a permanent form, was making no inconsiderable progress toward civilization.

Between the date of the promulgation of the Fuero Viejo in the year 992 and the year 1255, at which period was promulgated the "Fuero Real," two circumstances occurred which occasioned a material change, not only in the laws of Spain, but indeed of all the nations of Europe. The one was the discovery at Amalfi of the Code and Pandects of Justinian, a work which astonished Europe, just emerging from barbarism, and which, as it contained the collected wisdom of the Roman jurists, became at once an object of study and admiration to all men whose education placed it within their reach. The other was the collection of the decretals of the church, privately executed by a monk called Gratian, in the year 1151, and subsequently enlarged and improved by a compilation of authorities made in the year 1236, in virtue of an order to that effect made by Pope Gregory IX.

During the period of time that intervened between the discovery of the Pandects in 1137, and the publication of the "Fuero Real" in 1255, it is rather difficult to ascertain what authority the former code obtained in Spain. The modern Spanish writers state (perhaps from a laudable feeling of national pride), that the Roman jurisprudence has never been considered as the law of the land on the peninsula; and it is not at this time binding as an authority. However true this may be when applied to the present state of jurisprudence in that country, matured and improved as it has been, by the experience of a long succession of ages; and enriched as it must be by the incorporation of all that is most valuable in the Roman law; yet it may be fairly questioned if it had not during the interval we speak of nearly superseded the use of the old Spanish *codes. This con- [*39 clusion may be safely drawn, first, from its acknowledged superiority over the ill digested and barbarous laws of Spain, and indeed of every other nation then existing; a superiority so striking as to be recognized even by the rudest and most uncivilized people to whom it was known. Second, from the influence of the clergy in that age; their well-known attachment to this system of laws; the zeal with which they labored for its introduction in every country of Europe, and their almost invariable success.<sup>2</sup> Lastly, from the very laws of the

It was the prerogative of the crown to erect them; but the right was often delegated to the clergy and nobility. Their immunities were very extensive.

Wheat. 5.

2.—These observations on the authority which the Roman law had in Spain, are not translated from the Spanish writers, but are my own ideas on the subject, introduced in the text, instead of a note, as better keeping up a connected view of the whole subject. The conclusions which I have drawn as to the influence of the civil law, are quite

Spanish kings themselves, the codes published by their directions, viz., the "Fuero Real" in the year 1255, and the "Partidas" in 1260. Nearly all that is excellent in each of these compilations, seems to have been borrowed from the Roman law, and hence the presumption strongly arises, that the sovereigns of that country, finding the use of the latter becoming general, it was thought more politic to sanction it by the authority of the state; accomplishing at once two useful objects by this measure—soothing national pride, and rejecting all those laws which were inconsistent with the then state of society in Spain.

Of the collection of Decretals (or decrees of the pope before mentioned), viz., those made by the monk Gratian in his private capacity, and those made by Rayamundo De Penafort in pursuance of an order of Pope Gregory IX., the latter only are received as authority in Spain.

In the work executed by De Penafort, the method of the Roman Pandects is very closely pursued. It is divided into five books, each of which are again subdivided into various titles. In the first, after various preliminaries <sup>40*</sup>] connected with a canonical *collection, it treats of the dignities of persons, of Ecclesiastical judgments; which latter form also the subject-matter of the second book. In the third, after treating again of the persons of Ecclesiastics and their benefices and prebendaries, some titles are subjoined upon the rules applicable to the construction of various contracts—how those ought to be interpreted which have for their object church property, or which appertain to its jurisdiction by reason of the personal privilege of the party defendant. The remainder of this book is occupied with the immunity of churches, of the regular clergy, and other matters of this nature. The fourth book is entirely occupied with the laws of the church respecting marriage, its antecedents, and consequences. And the fifth and last treats of criminal jurisprudence, and of the penalties affixed to Ecclesiastical crimes, such as simony and other offenses committed by persons belonging to the church. It also contains provisions respecting church censures, and concludes, in imitation of the Pandects, with the titles, the signification of words, and maxims of law. (Reglas del Derecho.) As the sixth, and other later collections, pursue the same method with that above mentioned, a particular account of them is deemed unnecessary.

In this state of the civil, criminal and canonical jurisprudence of Spain, the Holy King Ferdinand the III., about the middle of the 13th century, gave much more force, extension and solidity to the Spanish Monarchy than it possessed in former periods; as well by the glorious conquest of the kingdoms of Cordova and Seville, as by the prudence and sagacity with which he governed the countries he inherited and subdued. This prince, and his son Alonzo (surnamed the Wise), feeling that the multitude of particular jurisdictions, and the exorbitant privileges conceded to the nobility and gentry, divided and weakened the kingdom, determined, for the purpose of avoiding its entire desolation, to form a general body of laws, or code, which by its operation might unite all classes of society, and at the same time preserve a regular graduation of rank—prevent or destroy the dangerous and horrible effects of feudal anarchy—confine the powerful nobles within the limits due to the prince—terminate the factions and discords between the families *of the <sup>41</sup>] great and their respective vassals—and finally establish good order by a judicious and correct administration of justice.

The death of Ferdinand III., which took place a short period after the conquest of Seville in 1252, prevented him from carrying into effect his salutary and necessary projects. His son, however (Alonzo the Wise), who inherited his kingdoms, and as it appears, all his father's views on this subject, carried his predecessor's intentions into complete operation by the formation of two codes, the first called the "Fuero Real," and the second the Partidas; the former was executed in the year 1255, and was designed as a precursor to the great work of the Partidas.

The "Fuero Real" is divided into four books, each composed of different titles. The first commences with the laws which direct the observance of the Christian faith—the preservation of the king and his children—presenting all the obligations of a Christian and a subject as forming the basis of sound morals and correct conduct in private life. Afterwards follow the titles respecting the alienation of church property; and it concludes with those respecting public officers; V. G. alcades, lawyers, notaries public, &c., &c.

The second book is altogether taken up with rules respecting judicial proceedings—of the competent tribunals—of the commencement of suits—the "Litis Contestatio," or joining issue—the modes of proof, and exceptions thereto; and concludes with the mode of regulating final judgments. The third book is principally occupied with the regulations respecting matrimony, jointures ("Las Arras"), acquiesces and gains, and the division of lands which are rented out (se dan a Plazos); afterwards of legacies, and estates in trust, inheritances, tutorships, and other points incident to these matters. From the tenth to the twentieth and last title of this book, are to be found the laws concerning various classes of contracts. The fourth and last book treats principally of Apostles, Jews, Saracens and their slaves.

These regulations are followed by an enumeration of various penalties affixed to different crimes; and it concludes with the law respecting adoptions, emancipations, pilgrims, and ships.

*From this analysis it will be seen, that <sup>42</sup>] the "Fuero Real" is a code enacted for the correct administration of civil and criminal jurisprudence among the different classes of the people, and the various provinces of the kingdom. In a word, it may be compared, as to its nature and object, to the institutes of Justi-in opposition to the declarations of many Spanish authors; but they appear to me, for the reasons above stated, fair and natural. The immense influence of the clergy, in Europe, during the middle ages, is well known. They had at one time nearly succeeded in supplanting the common law in England, and contributed essentially to the establishment of the civil law all over the continent, either as the only municipal code, or as supplementary to it in all cases where it was silent or defective.

nian, the primary object of which is the rights of persons and things ("Dericho particular"), in which point of view its excellence has been long admired. But as the public law makes no part of its object, it has not touched on it; or, if mentioned at all, merely as incident to, or connected with, the subjects of which the said code professedly treats.

The Partidas, which was concluded and published by the direction, and under the auspices, of Don Alonzo the Wise, in 1260, is a complete body of law (El cuerpo completo) which combines the public with the private law, all digested and prepared, says the author (from which the account of this code is taken), in a most scientific, just, solid, Christian, and equitable manner; and which has not, perhaps, its equal in all Europe. The first Partidas is an exact compendium of the canon law as it existed at that epoch. The second is a refined summary of the ancient laws and customs of the nation, comprising in itself, and combining the greatest political wisdom with a perfect legal history. The third, fifth, and sixth Partidas, contain an abridgment of all that is most valuable in the Roman law, respecting judgments, contracts, and last wills and testaments, each of which are well accommodated to the state of the monarchy at that time; and to the deciding and settling doubtful points of the civil law.<sup>1</sup>

The fourth is a compendium of the civil and canon laws appertaining to espousals, matrimony, and their material incidents; *and the seventh and last is, that which treats of crimes and their penalties, concluding in the manner of the pandects and decretals, with titles of the signification of words and rules of law.

This work, for the praise of which it has been a subject of regret to the Spanish writers, that their language is inadequate, comprehends so many rules of religion and justice, and of pure and Christian policy, that a volume would be necessary to state (according to them) even the principal ones. For in truth, they add, what regulations can be conceived better adapted to national happiness than that which points out the mode of succession to the kingdom? What more convenient and honorable than that which prescribes that the king ought to honor all classes of useful subjects, including even laborers and artizans, by reason of their utility to the state? Where can anything be found more conformable to true religion, and the spirit of the evangelist, than that which directs that he who is recently converted to the Holy Catholic Church should be honored and respected; what more honorable and equitable, than that which confines the punishment of crimes to the true delinquents, abolishing attainders and corruption of blood? and what more congenial to population than that which promotes matrimony by the most cogent and persuasive reasons?

Notwithstanding its various and superlative merits, on account of the jealousy of the nobles, and of the fatal wound they found it would inflict on their privileges, and from other causes which began to operate after its formation, this code was not published until the year 1348, in the celebrated cortes held in the (Alcala de Henares), under the reign of Alonzo XI. And even then it is probable the death of this monarch, which took place in the year 1350, impeded, in a considerable degree, the effect it would otherwise have had. Its complete and beneficial operation may be dated from the year 1505, under the reigns of the celebrated Don Fernando and Donna Juana, in the famous cortes held in the city of Toro.

During the time that intervened from the formation of the Partidas, to its first publication in the cortes of Alcala, were *promul- [*44 gated in the year 1310, Las Leyes De Estilo, which amount in number to 252, without any division into books or other parts. The greater part of these treat of judgments, civil as well as criminal; then follows a description of the persons who may appear in court, and the proofs necessary to adduce them. Others again treat of contracts and last wills.

As there are forms or mode of proceedings before the judges and tribunals, in the order in which the judgements are obtained, it is a natural consequence, that the said laws should include all that was practiced at that time in litigating causes in the courts of justice—following as a rule of action, that which was contained in the laws or Fuero, and even in some particular cases against the provisions of the latter; as a special custom, legitimately introduced, derogates from the general laws. Finally these laws of Estilo are taken notice of in our subsequent laws, and observed whenever it appears that they have been generally practiced on.

From this statement of the various codes, it will be seen that until the middle of the fourteenth century the jurisprudence of Spain consisted in the general and ancient usages and customs of the nation; reduced to codes which were called the Fueros, and that which belonged to the practice of the courts formed the Leyes De Estilo. For although the Partidas were then composed, which included a considerable number of civil and canonical decisions corresponding to all the branches of private and public law, yet as they were not published until the year 1348, in the cortes of Alcala, there could not consequently be any authority attached to them on contracts or in courts of justice.

From this epoch, and particularly from the period of the cortes, held at Toro, in the year 1505, the aspect of the national law gradually changed: 1st. Because the Partidas being then published, they applied to all cases where there was not a particular statute (fuero) on the subject. 2d. Because the professors of the law in these ages, being passionately inclined, as well to the study of the canon as of the civil law, a great many of the principles of the former system were introduced, and remain in force, with certain modifications, to this day.

1.—An historical commentary upon the Partidas was published, at Madrid, in 1808, by Marina, the celebrated historian of Spain, in which valuable work he gives an account of the institutions of Leon and Castile; relates the efforts of Ferdinand III. and Alonzo the Wise, in municipal legislation; and analyses the Partidas, showing in what respects that celebrated code deviates from the ancient common law of Spain, and in what manner it was corrupted (according to him), from its primitive simplicity by an absurd imitation of the canon and civil law.

45*] *Some changes were made in these, and several new laws or ordinances were published, under the name of "Pragmaticas," from time to time, as necessity or the situation of the state required them. When they amounted to a considerable number, they were collected into one or more volumes by virtue of a royal ordinance, and acquired legislative force. Of this class was the first code of the ordinance of Alcavala, made and authorized in the year 1348. It is divided into 32 titles, each composed of different laws, relative to the manner of conducting suits, regulations on the subject of contracts and testaments, and penalties affixed to the commission of certain crimes.

The second is that which comprehends the 83 laws which were made and published in the celebrated cortes, held at Toro, in the year 1505, providing for the solemnities of testaments—the right of succeeding, ab intestato, and by will. The legacies of the third and fifth, given by the testator to one heir in preference to another—the order of succession for the nobles of Spain—the support or aliment which fathers owe to their natural children—the penalties of adultery, and other incidental titles, which are inserted in the correspondent titles of the Recopilacion.<sup>1</sup>

Before and after the cortes of Toro, there were made several collections of ordinances, proclamations, and other royal determinations; which were published, from time to time, as the circumstances of the monarchy required it. The first of which is known by the name of the "Ordenamiento Real," authorized and published by the Catholic King and Queen, Ferdinand and Isabella, in the year 1496, distributed into eight books, and then into different titles, in which were contained the entire or partial repeals that had been made of the Fueros, or ancient laws; also a few of the new provisions 46*] introduced. But *as these are all inserted in the Recopilacion, with corresponding titles, a further explanation is unnecessary under this head.<sup>2</sup>

The Recopilacion was first published in the year 1567, in virtue of an order made by Phillip II. It includes the laws which are not repealed by the Ordenamiento Real, and the Ordenamiento del Alcavala; all those of Toro and others, which had been published in the interim. From the year 1567 to 1777, there have been published various editions of this work with some short additions. But under the latter denomination we do not include the "Autos acordados," or resolutions or decrees of the council authorized and published by the king, who by a royal order united them in one volume, divided them into books and titles corresponding to those of the Recopilacion, and published them for the first time in the year 1745. They now form the third and last volume of this work, and are always printed with the original collection.

This work is divided into nine books, and composed of divers titles. The method used in it is well calculated to attain the object which the very name it bears would seem to imply; and, without any great labor, it is easy to find in it those edicts or laws which we have at any time occasion to examine.

The first book treats exclusively of the Catholic religion and ecclesiastical matters, and contains thirteen titles.

The second book, in its commencement, treats of laws in general; after which follow many titles prescribing the duties of the presidents of audiences, chancellors, judges, and inferior officers of courts. The most instructive title in this book, is that which speaks of the king's council ("el concejo del Rey").

The third begins with laying down rules and regulations that ought to be observed in the various tribunals; it afterwards treats of the affairs of justice in cities and provinces *(Los Corregidores), contains a variety of [*47 dispositions, with respect to the Alcades, or officers charged with the authority of permitting exports, &c.—the president and council of Bilbao—the council charged with that branch of rural economy connected with the management of cattle,<sup>3</sup> and concludes with regulations for the examination and reception of physicians, surgeons, apothecaries, farriers, &c.

In the first title of the fourth book, are found necessary rules and regulations for the proper maintenance of the royal jurisdiction. From thence, to the twenty-second title, is occupied with the law of the different species of judgments; some decisions of the ancient law on the subject; the mode of carrying on suits, and the time given for their termination; rules with regard to pleas, answers, the taking of testimony, the practice to be pursued in the courts of the first and second instance; proceeding against persons in contempt, &c. From the twenty-third to the thirty-third title is found the law defining the duties of sheriff, jailer, and the fees allowed them by law.

The fifth book is principally occupied with three subjects, and their incidents, viz: First, marriage; second, inheritances or successions; and, third and last, of contracts, concluding with the titles relative to banks and their officers, goldsmiths, &c., and the regulations established with respect to bakers, &c. In this book, say the Spanish writers, the most worthy of attention is the fourth title, which speaks of commissioners appointed to make wills; a singular authority, and not of any antiquity in their jurisprudence. The sixth, which treats of an heir who receives a legacy of the third or fifth

1.—These laws of "Toro" are all included in the Recopilacion, but they are introduced into the latter work as new laws. Thus, in the Spanish law-writers, we frequently find references made to them in this way, law 20 of Toro, which is law of the Recopilacion, &c.

2.—The "Ordenamiento Real," seems to have been a work or collection of the same kind with the ordinance of Alcavala, viz., collections of the royal ordinances or Pragmaticas. The latter collection comprised those up to the year 1348—the former, from that time up to the year 1496. The laws of Toro seem to have originated in the cortes or national assemblies, or, at least, to have been first promulgated there.

3.—This is a curious title. The assembly is composed of the richest and most extensive owners of cattle, sheep, &c. A member of the council presides at their deliberations, and they meet once every year. This meeting is called "el honorado concejo de las mestas," an expression which does not admit of a literal translation. The Recopilacion contains a variety of provisions establishing the authority of this council, defining its limits. It may be gathered from the existence of this tribunal, and from the anxiety displayed by the Spanish government, from time to time, by its laws on this subject, what vast importance was attached to the inestimable flocks of merinos, of which they were for ages the sole owners.

48*] of the property of *the testator. The seventh, which provides for the succession of nobles, it being the first in any of the collections of the laws of Spain, where we find a distinct title appropriated to this subject. The fifteenth title prescribes the formalities which ought to be observed with regard to taxes, respecting which there had been, anciently, various disputes.

The provisions, or titles, of the sixth book, are more conformable than those of any other in the Recopilacion to the ancient codes of Spain, los fueros antiguos, and those which are contained in the second Partidas. They treat of knights and of gentlemen, of towns, of vassals, of cattle, and fortresses—of the cortes—of ambassadors, inspections, tributes, ports—of those exempted from taxes and not subject to the prohibition which prevents certain articles from being exported. And the book concludes with the titles respecting the hunter, gamekeeper, and fowler, of the king. One of these titles is respecting the young of horses of a noble race.

The seventh begins with the matters that conduce to the good government of corporations; of the rents and property of councils; of the privileges of cities; of taxes; of public limits and commons. Then follow various titles which have no connection either with each other, or with the antecedent ones; as, the tenth speaks of ships; the eleventh, which speaks of artisans; the twelfth, which contains regulations with respect to dress. From the thirteenth to the seventeenth, is taken up with rules respecting the cloth manufactories, and concludes with those of chandlers and manufacturers of tallow, and the tanners and braziers of the kingdom.

The eighth book maintains a more perfect connection between its title and the matters contained therein. It begins with the preparatory steps for the ascertaining of offenses, and then proceeds to the twenty-third title, with the penalties affixed to each crime, according to its grade; among which, say the Spanish authors, is worthy of note, the eighth, which imposes the pain of death ("ultimo supplicio"), with other penalties, against any person who sends a challenge or accepts one.

In this provision, they say, is seen the difference 49*] once between the *ancient and present state of the monarchy. The authority of the laws was not then sufficient to punish the individuals attached to, or connected with, families of vast opulence and power, who might commit violations of good order; duels were, therefore, permitted; regulations fixed for carrying them publicly into effect, and the strongest vengeance of the law, as well as the more dreadful punishment of public contempt, awaited those who, either injured or injuring, failed to resort to this mode to obtain satisfaction, or give redress.

The nobles, at last, as the light of knowledge began to dawn, perceived the superior advantages of recurring to the laws instead of resorting to these public and solemn combats. A change, correspondent to the alteration in the general opinion, took place, and duels are now placed on the same footing in Spain, as in every other well-regulated country in Europe, condemned by the laws of God and man, forbidden by the maxims of religion; yet still practiced by the obedience of all men to a false code of honor, which is unequal in its principles, and almost always cruel in its operations.<sup>1</sup>

The ninth, and last book, is occupied with details in all its branches of the royal treasury; the office of treasurer and auditor of the public exchequer; of those who compose the treasury council. Then follow the judicial regulations for the recovery of taxes, of the royal rents, &c. In continuation, are *found, the tariff of [*50 duties levied by the king on each article sold within the kingdom, the confiscation of contraband, &c., &c.

A more extensive analysis has been given of this work than of any other, because, as it is last in time, it is first in authority.

The author, from whom this account is principally taken, observes, that in the work entitled, "Autos Accordados," there are wanting many titles, which are to be found in the Recopilacion.

Since the publication of the Recopilacion, there have been issued by the kings of Spain, a vast number of proclamations, decrees, instructions for governors of Spanish America, "Royal cédulas," which have not as yet been compiled, although there was an order of the king in council to that effect. The want of a general collection of these laws, is very frequently and seriously deplored by the Spanish lawyers.

From this short statement of the rise and progress of the Spanish law, it will be seen, that the ancient codes of Spain have been, like that of almost every other country in Europe, nearly supplanted by modern changes and improvements; yet an acquaintance with them is necessary to him who wishes to understand the laws of his country, and aspires to rise to the higher honors of his profession. This knowledge, indeed, has become indispensable, since the order of council, passed the 4th of December, 1713, in reference to many laws anterior to the "Fuero Juzgo," and which are found in that work, the Partidas, the Ordenamientos, the first law of Toro, the new Recopilacion, &c. It provides, that in the conducting and deciding of causes, the courts of justice shall be governed by the Recopilacion, the ordinances and decrees, the laws of the Partidas, and the other codes ("Los otros fueros"), notwithstanding it is said they have become obsolete; and in case nothing can be found on the subject, in any of

1.—The institution of judicial combats, or trial by battle, was universally established in Europe by the barbarous nations who established themselves on the ruins of the Roman Empire; (Montesquieu. Esprit des Loix, l. 28, c. 14, 18; Gibbon, Decline and Fall, &c., Vol. vi., c. 38, note. 84; Robertson, Hist. of Charles V., Vol. I., sec. I., note, 322), and was even transported by their posterity into the kingdoms founded by them in the East, during the crusades, as appears by that venerable monument of feudal jurisprudence, the Assise of Jerusalem. (Gibbon, Decline and Fall, &c., Vol. xi., c. 58). "It has been slowly abolished by the laws and manners of Europe," and had a legal existence even in England, (though not practically used), so recently as the year 1818, when it was formally suppressed by act of Parliament, in consequence of the attempt to resort to it in the appeal of murder prosecuted in the case of Ashford v. Thornton, which will be found reported in 1 Barnwell & Alderson's Reports, 405, and in which the ingenuity of the learned judges was perplexed to contrive the means of evading this species of trial, which was demanded by the accused.

these codes or laws, then that recurrence shall be had to the sovereign authority to decide on them. This decree was confirmed by Philip V., June 12th, 1714; directing the ancient laws which had not been repealed to be observed, although they might have been generally considered as void by non-user.

Between all these codes, and the laws of the 51*] Indies, there *exists a great connection. In the American provinces of Spain, the study of the civil law is a part of their education at the universities; and by the laws for the government of these provinces, it is expressly provided, that where the Recopilacion de las Indias is wanting in provisions for any case that may arise, recourse shall be had to the laws of Castile or Spain.

The "Recopilacion de las Indias, the collection of laws of the Spanish provinces, is very similar to the "Recopilacion," of which so much has been said, both in its order and materials.

In the first book are inserted all the definitions concerning points of ecclesiastical law. In the second, after speaking of laws in general, it prescribes the order of government for the council of the Indies, and the other superior and inferior tribunals thereon. The third begins with the subject of the royal domain, and provides for its officers; then treats of viceroys, presidents, and governors, and of military affairs; and concludes with the title concerning ceremonies, post-offices, and Indian couriers. The fourth book commences with the laws relative to discoveries by sea and land; treats afterward of cities, their population, and of their rights and contributions; of gold and silver mines, and incidental matters; and concludes with regulations for the pearl fishery, and the manufactory of cloth. The fifth book treats, principally, of the boundaries and divisions of the different governments; after which follow many miscellaneous matters, v. g. that of the Holy Brotherhood; of the assembly for the police of cattle; of physicians and apothecaries; of the order of judicial proceedings, and concludes with a title respecting the domicile of individuals. The sixth book is occupied nearly throughout with the laws respecting Indians, the commandants placed over them, &c. The seventh is taken up with criminal jurisprudence. The eighth, with the laws respecting the royal treasury; and the ninth with regulations respecting the armada, or fleets, by means of which the commerce of Spain was formerly carried on with the colonies. But these regulations are now obsolete.

This work, it may be seen from the analysis of it, is of a *very limited nature, and [*52 seems almost entirely confined to regulations respecting the functionaries of the government in those countries; leaving the subject of contracts, the rights of persons and things, &c., &c., to be regulated by those laws which are in force in old Spain respecting them. The order in which those laws govern, may be seen by reference to this short history, applying to them this concise, but universal maxim, that those which are last in date are first in authority.

The ordinance of Bilboa is a commercial code of great value.

[NOTE III.]

ON THE SUBJECT OF PRIZE LAW.

In order to complete the information contained in the former notes to these reports, on the subject of prize law, the editor has thought proper to subjoin to the present volume the text of the chapters of the Consolato del Mare, on that subject, as translated by Dr. Robinson, and of the principal ordinances regulating the practice of the tribunals on the European continent, in matters of prize, which are found scattered in different books, not always accessible to the general reader. The prize code of Spain is, in general, copied from that of France; but wherever any considerable differences occur, the editor has noted them in the margin. The prize codes of the new states, which have recently arisen in Spanish America, and which are now engaged in war with the parent country, are also modeled upon those of France and Spain, as will be seen by a reference to the prize ordinance of Buenos Ayres, annexed to the 4th volume of these reports. These pieces will show, that, except the severe rule condemning the goods of a friend found on board the ship of an enemy, and the more relaxed principle of free ships free goods, both of which have occasionally been adopted by certain powers, together with some other less important anomalies, the leading principles of prize law, as now administered, have been established and acted upon by the principal maritime states of the world from a very early period.

As a further apology for inserting them in this place, the editor begs leave to refer the learned reader to the following observations of Sir William Grant, in a question arising upon a warranty of neutrality in a policy of insurance, alleged to be falsified by a sentence of a French court of admiralty grounded on the ordinances of France: "These ordinances," says that accomplished judge, "have been misunderstood; sometimes by the French courts of admiralty themselves, and sometimes by the courts in this country. Those in France considered these ordinances as making the law, and as binding on neutrals, and have, therefore, sometimes declared, in the same breath, that the property was neutral, and yet that it was liable to condemnation; whereas, all that was meant by those ordinances was, to lay down rules of decision conformable to what the lawyers and statesmen of the country understood to be the just principles of maritime law. When Louis XIV. published his famous ordinance of 1681, nobody thought that he was undertaking to legislate for Europe, merely because he collected together, and reduced into the shape of an ordinance, the principles of the marine law as then understood and received in France. I say, as understood in France, for although the law of nations ought to be the same in every country, yet, as the tribunals which administer that law are wholly independent of each other, it is impossible that some differences should not take place in the manner of interpreting and administering it in the different countries which acknowledge its authority. Whatever may have been since attempted, it was not, at the period now referred to, supposed that one state could make or alter the law of nations; but it was judged convenient to declare certain principles of decision, partly for the purpose of giving a uniform rule to their own courts, and partly for the purpose of apprising neutrals what that rule was. And it was truly observed at the bar, in the course of the argument, that it has been matter of complaint against us (how justly is another 54*) *consideration), that we have no code by which neutrals may learn how they may protect themselves against capture and condemnation. Now, this court, in this case, seems to us to have well and properly understood the effect of their own ordinances. They have not taken them as positive laws binding upon neutrals but they refer to them as establishing legitimate presumptions, from which they are warranted to draw the conclusion which it is necessary for them to arrive at, before they are entitled to pronounce a sentence of condemnation." CHAP. CCLXXIII.—Of Merchant Vessels captured by an armed ship.

SECTION 1.—If an armed ship, or cruiser, meets with a merchant vessel belonging to an enemy, and carrying a cargo the property of an enemy, common sense will sufficiently point out what is to be done; it is, therefore, unnecessary to lay down any rules for such a case.

2. If the captured vessel is neutral property, and the cargo the property of enemies, the captor may compel the merchant vessel to carry the enemy's cargo to a place of safety, where the prize may be secure from all danger of recapture, paying to the vessel the whole freight, which she would have earned at her delivering port; and this freight shall be ascertained by the ship's papers, or in default of necessary documents, the oath of the master shall be received as to the amount of the freight.

3. Moreover, if the captor is in a place of Wheat. 5.

safety, where he may be secure of his prize, yet is desirous to have the cargo carried to some other port, the neutral vessel is bound to carry it thither; but for this service, there ought to be a compensation agreed upon between them; or, in default of any special agreement, the merchant vessel shall receive for that service the ordinary freight that any other vessel would have earned for such a voyage, or even more; and this is to be understood *of a ship that has arrived in the place [55 where the captor may secure his prize; that is to say, in the port of a friend; and going on an ulterior voyage to that port, to which the captor wishes her to carry the cargo which he has taken.

4. If it shall happen that the master of the captured vessel, or any of the crew, shall claim any part of the cargo as their own, they ought not to be believed on their simple word; but the ship's papers or invoice shall be inspected; and in defect of such papers, the master and his mariners shall be put to their oaths; and if, on their oaths, they claim the property as their own, the captor shall restore it to them; regard being paid, at the same time, to the credit of those who swear and make the claim.

5. If the master of the captured vessel shall refuse to carry the cargo, being enemy's property, to some such place of safety, at the command of the captor, the captor may sink the vessel if he thinks fit, without control from any power or authority whatever, taking care to preserve the lives of those who are in her. This must be understood, however, of a case where the whole cargo, or at least the greater part, is enemy's property.

6. If the ship should belong to the enemy, the cargo being either in the whole, or in part, neutral property; some reasonable agreement should be entered into, on account of the ship now become lawful prize, between the captor and the merchants owning the cargo.

7. If the merchants refuse to enter into such an agreement, the captor may send the vessel home to the country whose commission he bears; and in that case the merchants shall pay the freight, which they were to have paid at the delivering port; and if any damage is occasioned by this proceeding, the captor is not bound to make compensation, because the merchants had refused to treat respecting the ship, after it had become lawful prize; and for this further reason, also, that the ship is frequently of more value than the cargo she carries.

8. If, on the other hand, the merchants are willing to come to a reasonable agreement, and the captor, from arrogance, or other wrong motives, refuses to agree, and forcibly sends the *cargo away, the merchants are not [56 bound to pay the whole, nor any part of the freight; and, besides, the captor shall make compensation for any damage he may occasion to them.

9. If the capture should be made in a place where the merchants have it not in their power to make good their agreement, but are, nevertheless, men of repute, and worthy to be trusted, the captor shall not send away the vessel without being liable to the damage; but if the merchants are not men of known credit, and cannot make good their stipulated payment, he may then act as it is above directed.

CHAP. CCLXXXVII.—Of cases of recapture.

SECTION 1.—If a ship is taken by the enemy, and afterwards another ship of a friend comes up, and effects a recapture, the vessel, and all that is in her, shall be restored to the former proprietors, on payment of a reasonable salvage for the expense, and trouble, and danger, that have been incurred; but this is to be understood of recaptures effected within the seigniory or territorial seas of the country, to which the captured vessel belongs, or before the enemy had secured the vessel to himself in a place of safety.

2. If the recapture has been effected within the enemy's territories, or in a place where the enemy was in entire possession of his prize, that is, in a place of security, the proprietors shall not recover, nor shall the recaptors claim any salvage; for they are entitled to the whole benefit of the recapture, without opposition from any rights of seigniory, or the claims of any person whatever.

3. If an enemy, having made a capture of a vessel, quits his prize on appearance of another vessel, either from fear, or from any doubt that he may entertain of her, and the vessel, on whose account the captured ship was abandoned, takes possession of the vessel that has been relinquished, and brings her into port, she shall be restored to the proprietor, or his heirs, without opposition, on payment of a 57* reasonable salvage, to be **fixed*, by agreement between the parties, or if the parties cannot agree, by the arbitration of creditable persons.

4. If it should happen that anyone abandons his vessel through fear of his enemy, and any friendly vessel falls in with the ship that has been deserted, and brings her into a place of security, that is to say, in a case where the finding vessel has not retaken the ship from the enemy, and where the enemy had not carried her into a place of security, and had not taken her from the owner, the finders shall have no claim to the vessel, nor to the cargo on board, but, by the use and custom of the sea, they may demand a reasonable salvage, to be settled either by agreement, or by reference to the arbitration of creditable persons; for it is not fit that anyone should endeavor to take undue advantage of the misfortunes of another, since he cannot foresee what may happen to himself; and because, every one should be ready to submit his disputes, especially in cases like the present, to the arbitration of two unexceptionable persons.

5. It is besides to be understood, in all that has been said, that everything shall be done without fraud; for no man can tell what may be his own case; and it sometimes happens that the deceit and injury which a person attempts to practice on others, light upon himself; therefore, if any persons, knowing that a ship is going on a voyage, where she must be exposed to danger or alarm from the enemy, fit out a vessel with a view, and for the purpose of doing injury to that ship or any other, in making salvage at their expense; or with a design of getting possession of the ship and cargo; if it can be proved against them, that they went out with any such intention, such persons shall not be entitled to any salvage on the ship or cargo, although the owner may have abandoned her; nor even, although she may have been taken by the enemy.

6. If those who fitted out the vessel cannot establish, in proof, that they did not arm with any of the before-mentioned intentions; or if it should be proved against them, that they armed for the purpose of doing injury to anyone, or generally to all, whom they might meet, in the form and manner of enemies; in such a case, whether they bring in a vessel, with or without **a cargo*—whether it shall be retaken [*58] from the enemy, or merely found by them, they shall take no benefit from it, but the whole shall be restored to the former proprietors; and moreover, such persons, so arming, shall be delivered over to justice, to be treated as robbers and pirates, if the fact can be established in proof.

7. If they are not convicted of such an intention, having either retaken or found a vessel in any of the situations above mentioned, they shall be entitled to their full right and benefit, according to the preceding regulations. But if the matter shall remain in doubt, or if it shall rest with them to disprove the charge, neither they, nor any that were with them, nor any that are interested in the event, shall be received to give evidence in their favor; nor shall any person of a covetous disposition, nor anyone who may be suspected of being biassed by money, be a witness for them.

8. If an enemy shall have made a capture of a vessel or cargo, and shall afterwards abandon it, voluntarily, and not from any fear or apprehension of any vessel coming upon him; and if any persons shall find the vessel or cargo that has been voluntarily abandoned, and bring it to a place of security, the property shall not be acquired to them, if any owner can be found; but they shall receive a reasonable salvage, to be fixed, at the discretion of reputable persons of the place, to which the ship or goods shall be carried.

9. If, after the expiration of a reasonable time, no owner comes forward, the finders shall receive for their salvage one-half of the proceeds, and the other half shall be applied in the manner that has been expressed and declared in a preceding chapter.<sup>1</sup>

*10. If the enemy, being in possession [*59] of any ship or cargo, shall not have deserted it voluntarily, but shall have been obliged to abandon it by storm or tempest, or on account of any ship or vessel by whom he may have been alarmed, the same rule shall be observed as if the enemy had quitted the same voluntarily, and of his own accord.

11. If the enemy, after a capture, comes to any place where he takes a ransom for his prize, if the proprietors wish to have their vessel or cargo again, he or they, who have ran-

1.—In chapter 249, the same proportion of a moiety is given to the finder of goods found floating in port, &c., after the expiration of a year and a day if no owner appears to claim. The other moiety was to be divided into two parts, of which the Lord of the Jurisdiction was to retain one; and to apply the other to pious purposes, for the soul of the proprietor. "All hora la giustitia debba dare a quello che trovata l'haverà, la metà pur suo beveraggio, et della metà che rimanerà, debba fare la giustitia due parti; et può pigliarne lui una parte, et l'altra che rimane, debba dare per amor di Dio, dove a lui piace, per l'anima di quello, di chi sarà stata.

somed her, are bound to deliver her up to the original owners, on payment of the debt and charges, and some further allowance besides, if they choose to accept it.

12. If an enemy, on capture of a ship or cargo, shall make a gift of it; such a donation or gift shall not be valid on any account; except that if a gift is made of the ship or cargo, to those to whom it belonged, such donation shall be valid. But if the captor bargains with the master in these words: "We are willing to give you your ship for nothing, but must have a ransom for the cargo," such a donation shall not be good; because, in the case of which we are now speaking, the enemy had not carried it to a place of security, so as to say, that he might not lose it; notwithstanding that he might so far have obtained power over his prize, as to be able to burn or sink it; though, in such case, it would be totally lost both to him and to the owner: it is to be understood, therefore, that if the cargo is ransomed, the master to whom his ship has been so given, is bound to contribute to the ransom paid for the cargo according to the value of the ship; and the same rule shall be observed. e contra also, and applied equally to the ransom of the ship or cargo.

13. If the captor shall have taken the prize to a place of security; that is, if it shall have been carried out of the seas of the enemy, where a recapture might be effected; if when the captor shall have it in safe possession, and in his own power, he shall make a donation, or sale of the ship or cargo, such a donation or sale shall be valid, without exception, from any quarter; unless he, to whom the donation was made, should have accepted it with an intention of doing a kindness to the owner, and for his benefit; in that case, he may restore it if he pleases; but otherwise, he is not compellable by any person, nor on any account.

14. If, however, he to whom the property belonged, can show that there has been any fraud in the business, the donation shall not, on any account, avail; but he, to whom it was made, ought to be seized by the lord of the country, and punished in goods, and in person, according to the circumstances of the case; and the ship or cargo shall be restored to the former owner.

15. If the ship or cargo shall have been sold by the enemy to anyone, the sale shall be valid, provided that he, who has purchased, can show that the sale was made to him by the enemy in a place of security; that is, where the enemy held the goods in question, in suo dominio; and in case anyone, who pretends to have acquired the ship or cargo by a just title, cannot prove the asserted sale, it shall not be valid; and if the former owner appears, and can make proof of his property, it shall be restored to him. The evidence of these disputed claims shall be discussed before two reputable persons of the country where the dispute arises, and without fraud; and if any fraud is discovered, the party against whom the fraud is proved, shall be bound to pay to the other party, costs, damages, and interests; and besides, the party consenting to the fraud shall be delivered over to the justice of the country.

16. If the master, or person acting for him, Wheat. 5.

recovers the ship or cargo by any means, he is bound to make restitution to the proprietors, according to their several proportions, on payment of the expenses pro rata.

17. If the master shall redeem any part of the cargo, or make any agreement with the consent of the major part of his copartners, by which he shall regain the ship or cargo, he may compel them to contribute, by course of justice, because they are as much under an obligation to him as if they had agreed to take part in building or purchasing a new ship.

18. But if the master makes any agreement, without the consent of his partners, or the major part of them, they are not bound [*61 to anything, unless they like it; nor is the master answerable to them for the rights and interests which they had in the ship at the time of capture; saving for any previous accounts which might be still remaining unsettled, respecting their shares in the ship or cargo at the time it was taken by the enemy.

19. If the original proprietors are disposed to resume their shares, and the master makes any opposition, the justice of the country may compel him to acquiesce; for there can be no ground of reasonable resistance on his part, if they are willing to pay their proportion of the expense; and it would be manifestly unjust that anyone should dispossess the rest of their property.

20. But if the master, or anyone for him, redeems his ship or cargo, after the enemy has gained a just title in it, and those who were part owners refuse to pay, as before specified, the master, or his agent, ought to repeat his demand upon them several times, and call upon them to pay their share; and if they still refuse, it shall be put up to auction, with permission of the government, and be disposed of to the best bidder.

21. If the ship or cargo shall be sold for more, after such refusal, than the ransom paid, the surplus shall be paid to the owners, according to their shares, if the master chooses it; otherwise, he is not obliged. And the master shall have the privilege of retaining the goods in question at the price that others are willing to give for them.

22. If the sale shall not produce so much as the ransom; if the master made the ransom without the consent of his partners, they are not bound for the deficiency, unless they choose it; and therefore it is reasonable that the master, or his agent, should have the privilege of retaining, at the price that any other person would give, as the deficiency would fall upon him; saving, however, that if any of the partners are inclined to resume their shares, they are bound to make good the deficiency to him pro rata. All the reasonings, and cases, and conditions above mentioned, shall be taken under the supposition that the enemy had carried the prize into a place of security; *and that the ransom or sale had been [*62 made fairly, and without fraud.

POSTSCRIPT.—It may not be improper to add as an observation pointing out the chasm between the regulations of this ancient code, and the prize ordinances of particular countries, and the provisions made in public treaties, in later times, on the subject of prize, that neither the laws of Oleron, nor the ordinances of Wisbuy, nor the quidon, nor the ordinances of the Hanse Towns, contain any regulations respecting the general law of prize; scarcely mentioning the subject, except incidentally, amongst the accidents to which merchant vessels are liable. There are, in the black book of the Admiralty, a few, and but a few, articles respecting it. In the ordinances of Barcelona, of 1340, there are also a few articles, but relating rather to the division of interest between the captors, than to the general subject.

ART. XXXIX.—Pour ce aussi que plusieurs Bourgeois, Propriétaires et Avicteuillieurs des Navires, nos sujets, nous y ont cy-devant fait remonstrer, que jaoit ce qu'ils facent faire les dits navires, et icelles équiper, et fournissent d'artillerie et autres munitions de guerre et de vivres, pour grever et offencer nos Ennemis et Adversaires, le tout à grands frais et despens, neantmoins ne leur est baillé que la Huictiesme pour leurs portions de butins qui sont gaignez sur nos dits Ennemis et Adversaires, qui n'est chose suffisante, en esgard aux grands frais, mises et despences qui leur convient faire, à faire faire les dits navires, et icelles équiper, munir et avicteuiller, qui est cause que les dits Bourgeois, Propriétaires et Avicteuillieurs, ne peuvent mettre sus, et nous servir de grands et puissans navires, ainsi qu'ils pourroyent faire; si des dits butins raisonnable et compétente portion leur estoit distribuée. XLIII.—Pour obvier à tout désordre et confusion, et à ce qu'à chacun son droit soit gardé, voulons et ordonnons, que les maîtres, contre-maîtres, Gouverneurs, et autres ayans charge des navires, amènent les personnes, navires, vaisseaux, marchandises, et autres biens qu'ils prendront à leur voyage, au mesme port et havre dont ils seront partis pour faire le dit voyage, ou au lieu de leur reste, sur peine de perdre tout le droit qu'ils auront en la dite Prise et butin, et d'amende arbitraire; le tout à appliquer au dit Amiral, à la charge et juridiction duquel sera le dit port dont ils seront partis, et outre de punition corporelle sinon que par force d'ennemis, ou par tempeste ils feussent contraints eux sauver en autre port; esquels cas seront tenus estans arrivés esdits autres ports et havres, avertir les dits officiers de la dite Amiraute, pour estre presens à l'inventaire des dites marchandises, avant qu'en décharger aucune sur les dites peines, et en rapporter certificat des dits officiers esdits havres dont ils seront partis, pour estre délivré ausdits Marchans, Propriétaires et Victuailleurs; ce qui aura en semblable lieu, pour les navires qui font voyage hors ce Royaume en marchandise ou autrement.

ART. XLV.—Et pour ce que plusieurs gens de guerre des dits navires voudroyent dire plusieurs biens tenir nature de pillage, pour par ce moyen les appliquer à leur profit, au préjudice de ceux qui équipent et arment les dits navires, nous avons dit et déclaré, disons et déclarons suivant nos anciennes Ordonnances, que nulle chose pourra estre dit pillage, qui excède la valeur de dix escus.

ART. LXI.—Si aucun navire de nos sujets pris par nos ennemis, a esté entre leurs mains jusques à vingt-quatre heures, et après il soit recous et repris par aucuns de nos navires de guerre, ou autres de nos sujets, la prise sera déclarée bonne; mais si la dite reprise est faite auparavant les vingt-quatre heures, il sera restitué avec tout ce qui étoit dedans, et aura toutefois le navire de guerre, qui l'aura recoussé et reprise, le tiers.

ART. LXII.—Et pour autant que en faisant prise en mer par nos navires et autres de nos sujets, plusieurs se présentent souvent pour y avoir part, sous ombre qu'ils veulent alléguer avoir veu prendre la dite prise, et oy l'artillerie durant le combat, encore qu'ils n'ayent esté l'occasion que l'ennemi se soit rendu par crainte d'eux; et afin d'éviter et obvier aux différends qui se peuvent mouvoir sur celles injustes demandes, il ne sera loisible à aucun navire, à qui qu'il soit appartenant, de demander aucune part et portion aux prises qui se feront, si ce n'est qu'ils ayent combattu ou fait tel effort, que pour son devoir l'ennemi ait amené ses voiles, ou bien qu'il en ait esté en quelque partie cause; dont les prisonniers seront creuz par serment; si ce n'est qu'il y ait eust promesse entre les uns et les autres, de départir les prises faites en présence ou absence.

ART. LXIV.—Là où aucuns navires à la semonce qui leur sera faite par les navires de guerre de nous et de nos sujets, amèneront libéralement sans aucune résistance leurs voiles et montreront leurs chartesparties et recognoissance aux dits navires de guerre, il ne leur sera fait aucun tort. Mais si le capitaine du navire de guerre ou ceux de son équipage lui robbent aucune chose, ils seront tenus ensemble- [*70 ment, et l'un seul et pour le tout, à la restitution entière, et avec ce condamnez realement et de fait et exécutez à la mort et supplice de la roue, nonobstant l'appel, pourvu que au dit jugement y assistent six Avocats ou Notables personnes de Conseil, qui orront de bouche les prisonniers, et seront tenus signer le dictum.

ART. LXV.—Pour ce qu'il est à considérer que ayant par nous ou autres de nos sujets, armé un, deux, ou plusieurs navires en guerre pour chercher l'aventure de profiter sur l'ennemi, l'on ne peut moins faire que découvrant navire à vue, ou plus prez, que de courir après pour sçavoir s'il est ami ou ennemi, au moyen de ce que la plus grande part des navires des amis et alliez sont de même construction que ceux des dits ennemis, aussi que bien souvent dedans les dits navires d'amis et alliez, les marchandises qui y sont appartiennent aux dits ennemis, ou bien il y a marchandises prohibez: Nous afin d'esclaircir nos gens et sujets, de ce qu'ils auront affaire eu ce que dessus, pour n'y faire faute et erreur dont ils puissent estre repris, avons permis et permettons, voulons et nous plaist, que tous navires de guerre de nous et de nos dits sujets, decouvrans à vue ou plus près, autres navires, soyent d'amis, alliez, ou d'autres, pourront courir après et les semondre d'amener les voiles, et estans refusans de ce faire après cette semonce leur tenir artillerie jusques à les contraindre par force, en quoy faisant venant au combat, par la témérité ou oppiniastreté de ceux qui seront dans les dits navires, et là dessus estans prius, nous voulons et entendons la dite prise estre dite et déclarée bonne.

ART. LXIX.—Et pour ce que par cy-devant sous couleur des pratiques et intelligences, que ont aucuns de nos alliés et confédérés avec nos ennemis, lorsqu'il y avoit aucune prise faite sur mer par nos sujets, plusieurs procès se suscitoient, par nos dits alliez, voulant dire que les biens, prins en guerre, leur appartiennoient, sous ombre de quelque part et portion qu'ils avoient avec nos dits ennemis, dont se sont ensuivies grosses condamnations à l'encontre de nos dits sujets; au moyen de quoi, iceux nos sujets ont depuis craint esquiper navires *en [*71 guerre, pour nous faire fermer et endommager nos ennemis: Nous pour remédier à telles fraudes, et afin que nos dits sujets reprennent leur courage, et ayent meilleur désir et occasion d'esquiper navires en guerre par mer, avons voulu et ordonné, voulons et ordonnons, que si les navires de nos dits sujets sont, en temps de guerre, prises par mer d'aucuns navires appartenans à autres nos sujets ou à nos alliez, confédérez ou amis, esquels y aient biens, marchandises ou gens de nos ennemis, ou bien aussi navires de nos dits ennemis, esquels y aient personnes, marchandises, ou autres biens de nos dits sujets, confédérez et alliez (in ord. 1543, ou esquels nos dits sujets ou alliez fussent personniers en quelques portions), que le tout soit déclaré de bonne prise—et dès à présent comme pour lors, avons ainsi déclaré et déclarons par ces présentes, comme si le tout appartenait à nos dits ennemis. Mais pourront nos dits alliez et confédérez, faire leur trafic par mer, dedans navires qui soient de leur obéissance et subjection, et par leurs gens et sujets, sans y accueillir nos ennemis et adversaires; les quels biens et marchandises ainsi chargés, ils pourront mener et conduire où bon leur semblera, pourvu que ce ne soient munitions de guerre, dont ils voulassent fortifier nos dits ennemis. Auquel cas, nous avons permis et permettons à nos dits sujets, les prendre, et amener en nos ports et havres, et les dites munitions retenir, selon l'estimation raisonnable, qui en sera faite par notre dit Amiral, ou son dit Lieutenant.

ART. LXX.—Et pour ce qu'il pourroit advenir, qu'aucuns de nos dits alliez et confédérez, voudroient porter plus grande faveur à nos dits ennemis et adversaires, que à nous, et à nos dits sujets, et à ceste cause, voudroient dire et soutenir contre vérité, que les navires prins en mer par nos dits sujets leur appartiendroyent, ensemble la marchandise, pour en frauder nos dits sujets: voulons et ordonnons, qu'incontinent après la prise et abordement de navire, nos dits sujets fassent diligence de recouvrer la charte partie, et autres lettres concernant la charge du navire; et incontinent à leur arrivée à terre, les mettre par devers le Lieutenant de notre dit Amiral, afin de cognoistre à qui le navire et marchandises appartiennent; et où ne 72*) *seroit trouvée charte partie dedans les dits navires, ou que le maître et compagnons l'eussent jettée en la mer, pour en celer la vérité, voulons que les dits navires ainsi prins, avec les dits biens et marchandises estans dedans, soient déclarez de bonne prise.

“1. Le Roi voulant bien permettre, non seulement à ses propres sujets, mais aussi à ceux des puissances étrangères, d'aller en course sur tous ceux qui contreviendront à ce règlement; un chacun qui souhaitera d'avoir une commission d'armateur, l'obtiendra de Sa Majesté ou de ses Amiraux: mais ceux qui ne seront pas munis d'une telle commission, n'auront point la permission d'aller en course.

“2. Lorsqu'un armateur fera un signal, ou donnera la chasse à un vaisseau, le maître sera obligé de lui obéir et de le respecter; de venir à son bord avec ses documents, ou de les envoyer par quelqu'autre. En cas que l'armateur trouve que le vaisseau ou sa charge, ou tous les deux ensemble, soient confiscables, il gardera les documents, après les avoir fait sceller par le propriétaire, et fera aussi sceller les écoutes du vaisseau avec son cachet et celui du maître.

“3. Si l'armateur trouve par les documents que le vaisseau et sa charge ne soient pas de bonne prise, il pourra encore envoyer quelqu'un à bord du vaisseau, pour examiner si les documents ne sont point défectueux; et en cas qu'ils soient trouvés conformes à la vérité, il laissera aller le vaisseau sans lui causer aucun dommage.

“4. Si le vaisseau, à qui on aura fait le signal, tâche de se soustraire, et s'il est ensuite pris par force, le maître sera obligé de donner satisfaction à l'armateur.

“5. Un vaisseau qui fera la moindre résistance à un armateur, perdra par là sa liberté, et sera de bonne prise, quoiqu'il ne l'eût pas été sans cela.

“6. L'Armateur ayant fait une prise, devra l'annoncer au Juge du lieu où il l'aura conduite, et lui produira le protocole *et les docu- 73 ments scellés; Il sera permis, à la réquisition de l'armateur, de faire débarquer le maître et son équipage; mais le vaisseau et sa charge resteront à la garde du dit armateur, qui sera obligé de restituer le tout, en cas que l'un et l'autre soient déclarés libres.

“7. Tous les vaisseaux qui seront amenez à Karelskroon, ou dans les ports à côté de Sund, seront jugez par des personnes établies pour cet effet, et ensuite par des Conseillers de l'Amirauté de Karelskroon; Ceux qui seront conduits à Gottenbourg ou aux environs, seront jugez par l'Amirauté de Gottenbourg; et ceux qui seront amenez à Stralsund ou dans quelques ports d'Allemagne, seront jugez par l'Amirauté de Stralsund. Ces jugemens devront se faire sans aucun retardement, et il ne sera pas seulement permis aux maîtres des vaisseaux, d'envoyer chercher ailleurs de nouvelles preuves pour leur justification. Mais en cas que l'affaire soit si embrouillée, qu'on ait besoin de plus grands éclaircissemens, on déchargera les effets jusqu'à ce tems là.

“8. Tous les vaisseaux appartenant aux ennemis ou à leurs Sujets, seront confiscables, sans avoir égard aux lieux d'où ils viennent et où ils vont.

“10. Comme aussi les vaisseaux construits ou achetez dans des places ennemies, et qui n'ont pas encore été dans des endroits libres.

“11. Les documens indispensables dont les maîtres de vaisseaux doivent être munis, sont le contract de la construction du vaisseau, le contract d'achat ou de transport; et l'Acte de Jaugeage du vaisseau, par où l'on puisse voir si sa capacité ou grandeur, y mentionnée, se rapporte aux contracts de construction et d'achat, comme aussi à la lettre de Mer ou attestation de l'Amirauté, par laquelle on puisse voir le lieu à qui le vaisseau appartient, le nom du capitaine, si les Fréteurs ne sont pas ennemis, et où le vaisseau est destiné: le tout devant être attesté *par serment, tant des capitaines 74 que des Fréteurs. Toute la charge devra aussi être spécifiée dans le même passeport, avec le nom du propriétaire, et le seing du magistrat du lieu; et les attestations que les officiers de la Douane pourroient donner à cet égard, ne seront point valables, quand même les magistrats seroient absens.

“12. Tous les vaisseaux qui auront des documens doubles ou contradictoires, en sorte que selon quelques uns ils soient confiscables, et selon quelques autres livres, seront néanmoins déclarés de bonne prise.

"13. Tous les effets appartenans à des sujets ennemis, ou envoyés pour leur compte, seront confiscables, dans quelque vaisseau que ce soit qu'ils soient trouvez.

"14. Comme aussi les effets des sujets neutres, qui se trouveront dans des vaisseaux ennemis.

"15. De même que tous les effets qui vont ou viennent des Havres mentionnez dans l'article IX.

"16. Tous les effets, de quelque valeur qu'ils soient, seront pareillement confiscables, lorsqu'on ne trouvera pas à bord les preuves nécessaires; savoir, un certificat attesté des Fréteurs par serment, et signé par le Magistrat du lieu, spécifiant en general la charge, à qui elle appartient, et où elle est destinée: comme aussi les connoissemens, contenant en particulier et par division la dite charge, et pour le compte et risque de qui elle est. Le capitaine sera aussi tenu d'être muni de pareils certificats et documens, pour la portion qu'il pourroit avoir dans la charge, avec la Liste et les marques des dits effets, qui doivent se rapporter avec les Connoissemens. Tous les Connoissemens qui ne seront pas entièrement remplis, sont tellement défendus qu'ils rendront le vaisseau confiscable comme aussi divers Connoissemens d'une même sorte des marchandises, ou doubles Connoissemens. Et quoiqu'il soit spécifié dans l'article IX., quels documens on doit produire pour la franchise du vaisseau et de sa charge; on pourra néanmoins en exiger encore d'autres, comme la chartepartie, Comptes de Facture, Lettres de Correspondence, Listes des Douanes, et autres pareils; après quoi on jugera si le vaisseau est franc ou non.

75* "17. Les effets qui auront des documens doubles ou contradictoires, seront confiscables comme les vaisseaux. Article XII.

"18. De même que toutes les marchandises de contrebande, qui peuvent être employées pour la Guerre.

"19. Tous les vaisseaux qui viennent ou vont à une place des ennemis, avec leurs charges, seront tenus pour confiscables.

"20. Les vaisseaux qui s'éloigneront de leur route, seront aussi confiscables, lorsqu'ils ne pourront pas justifier qu'ils y ont été contraints par tempête ou mauvais tems.

"21. Comme il doit y avoir sur chaque vaisseau un rôle de tout l'équipage, signé par le Magistrat du lieu à qui il appartient, avec le nom du lieu de la naissance de chaque Matelot, et à qui il appartient: Sa Majesté veut qu'il n'y ait sur chaque vaisseau, qu'un quart de Matelots nez dans les Païs ennemis; sous peine d'être confisqué de même que les vaisseaux qui n'auront pas de Rôles ou Listes.

"22. En cas qu'une partie du vaisseau ne soit pas libre, et que l'autre le soit, toutes les parties du dit vaisseau seront confiscables.

"23. Tout ce qui sera déclaré de bonne prise, appartiendra entièrement à l'Armateur et à ceux qui auront fait l'Armement, sans qu'on en retienne la moindre chose pour le Roi, ou pour le public."

Ordinance of his Majesty the King of Denmark, Norway, the Vandals, and Goths, &c., &c. Dated 23d Sept., 1659.<sup>1</sup>

We, Frederick the Third, by the grace of God, King of Denmark, Norway, &c., &c., do hereby make known to all persons; Whereas, *in our most gracious declarations, respecting those who trade by sea, bearing date the 30th August last, it is set forth—concerning the certificates for ships (the sea-briefs), as well as the certificates for the goods and cargo, on board ships which are destined to Sweden, or to other territories and towns belonging to the crown of Sweden, or now in possession of the Swedes, as long as this war shall continue, viz., in what form they shall be composed and made out so as to be deemed sufficient by the Court of Admiralty, and to avail and benefit those persons, that shall produce them in court. Now, to the end that every person may know it, and in a right manner and form furnish ships and goods with certificates; therefore we have most graciously ordered and consented, and do also hereby order and consent, that all and every certificate made, taken out, or granted, for free ships and goods in neutral places, and by neutral persons, ship-masters and owners, as long as this war continues, must, in their letter and true meaning, manner and form, be of the tenor as here follows:

*1. The certificate for the ships (which [*77 must be made upon oath, and with fingers erect, by every ship-owner, or ship-master, before the magistrates of his own town or place), must, in its letter and true meaning, be of the tenor as hereunder; and the said certificate must likewise be signed and sealed by the usual sworn secretary or notary; and besides them, as further ordered on this subject, in our aforesaid most gracious declaration.

We, N. N. and N. N., conjunctively, ship-master, and owner, of the ship N. N., of the

1.—In 1793, the Danish government issued the following proclamation respecting the trade of Danish subjects, in the war which was then just broke out:

"We, by the grace of God, Christian VII., &c.

"It is only by strictly observing the rules and provisions stipulated for by our treaties with foreign powers, that the merchants of our kingdoms can enjoy the security which our neutrality has procured for the Danish flag during the present calamities of the war. We therefore order,

"Art. 3. As the principles of neutrality do not permit any neutral vessel to enter a port blockaded by any of the belligerent powers, or to have articles on board, considered as contraband, and destined for states at war, or their subjects, or, finally, such as already belong to them; the magistrates must inform the parties concerned of these principles, and be careful that the required oath contains also the engagement to receive nothing on board which may be comprised in the under-mentioned denominations.

"Art. 4. By contraband is understood, fire-arms and other species of arms, horses, harness, and in general every article necessary for the construction and repair of vessels, with the exception, however, of unwrought iron, beams, boards and planks of deal and fir.

"Art. 6. In the treaty of commerce and alliance of 1670, with England, it is stipulated that amongst the ship's papers there should be, in time of war, a certificate to prove that the cargo belongs to a neutral power. In order, therefore, to prevent all cause of dissatisfaction on either side, we have ordered the magistrates in our ports to deliver the certificates required on this subject, and also our consuls in foreign ports; and the former as well as the latter are enjoined to affix their signature to them.

"Art. 14. The certificates respecting the neutrality of the vessel, as well as the cargo, must be granted under the forms prescribed by the Council of Commerce."

burthen of N. lasts, now commanded by captain N. N., do hereby certify, that the aforesaid ship belongs to no other person, but solely to us, in true right of property, and that no enemy or other person besides ourselves, aforesaid, has any share or interest therein; also, that neither with our conjunctive knowledge and will, or with the knowledge and will of either of us, shall any goods belonging to enemies be laden therein. So help us God, and His holy Word!

2. And that the certificate, which is required to be taken upon oath, and with fingers erect, for every ship's cargo, and goods, and merchandise on board, by every merchant, or freighter, before the magistrates of his own town or place, must likewise be signed in the manner aforesaid, and must in its letter and true meaning be of the following tenor:

I, N. N., inhabitant and burgher in N. N., do hereby and by virtue of these presents certify, that all such goods as shall be laden in the ship N. N., whereof N. N. is master, destined to N. N., and which shall be specified in this certificate, with their denominations and marks, do belong to no other person whatever, in this world, besides myself solely and only, and were purchased with my own property or means. Also, that they do solely go for my own account and risk; and this not in appearance only, or for color sake, so that by means of some clandestine agreement with enemies, I am collusively to cover the said goods by this declaration, as if they were for my own account and risk, until they are brought in safety, and that then they shall belong to, and be sold for a-78*count of, enemies; but *that they do bona fide belong to myself, solely, without fraud. So help me God, and His holy Word.

And in this certificate there must be inserted a true specification of all the goods, belonging to each certificant, which he has thus caused to be laden, and marked with his proper mark. Inasmuch as such certificates that are of a different tenor, or affirmed to in a manner different from the above-mentioned, shall be considered of no value, before our Court of Admiralty, whosoever the claimant may be, or wherever he may be found with such upon the seas; but they shall be, and remain of no value, even as those certificates are held and considered, which, in a judicial manner, or otherwise, are proved to be false; inasmuch as by and with the advice of our beloved counselors of state, we have by these presents so enacted it, and have before issued orders concerning the same, in our most gracious declaration.

3. And whereas in our aforesaid most gracious declaration, as well as in all the passports granted by us, it is prohibited to carry, or bring any sorts of contraband goods to and from Sweden, and the countries and places belonging thereto, or at present possessed by them. Now, that every person may know what sort of goods it is which are considered and deemed as contraband, we have on that subject made and given this specification and declaration to wit:

1. The following goods will be regarded as contraband, viz.: All sorts of ammunition, arms, gunpowder, matches, and saltpetre; also, saddles, horse-harness, and horses; further, oak ships' timber, and all sorts of ship's materials and apparel, such as sail-cloth, tackling, cordage, and whatever else is considered necessary and useful for carrying on war, besieging, blockading, or other military operations, by land and by sea.

2. The following shall likewise be considered as contraband and prohibited goods, to wit: All sorts of provisions for food and beverage, as well as all sorts of coarse and fine salt, without any distinction whatever, none excepted; save, solely, all sorts of wines, brandy, and spices (or groceryware), and also such quantity of herrings and salt, as are destined to Narva, or *Reval, from which places traffic is [*79 carried on with the Russian towns and countries; to the end that the trade of Russia may be carried on unmolested; which articles we have graciously, out of a special consideration, consented to have excepted, and to allow that they may be freely conveyed to Narva aforesaid, and the before-named Livonian cities.

3. The following goods shall also be reckoned as contraband, viz.: Calamine, cotton, and whatever else serves for the furtherance of all sorts of manufactures, made, woven, or otherwise put together in Sweden, and the countries and towns under its dominion. Also, such articles as are cast, smith's work, or wire drawn, whether they be of copper, brass, iron, lead, or other materials, or what is made either of metal, linen, or wool, wheresoever they are met with, on board of free, or unfree ships, belonging to Swedish subjects. Under this description are to be understood, all sorts of ordnance and cannon, mortars of brass or iron, small or great, all sorts of arms, armour, arms for the use of cavalry or infantry, anchors and anchor-stocks, nails, spikes, and bolts; also all sorts of ready-made house furniture and cooper's articles; together with copper and all other coins, being the property of Swedish subjects, and exported from the dominions of Sweden, although they should be found on board of ships belonging to free, or neutral places, and persons, as aforesaid; nevertheless that, on that account, free ships and goods belonging to neutral persons, shall not be subject to confiscation, if with such legal and proper certificates, as above described, they can judicially be proved to be such.

4. But such goods as, in the before-mentioned manner, are satisfactorily proved to belong to free places and neutral persons, and by them are exported from Sweden in ships of their own, whether it be iron in bars, osmund (moonwort), refined copper (original Gaar-copper), brass wire, and copper in plates; further, all sorts of grain, and greasy articles (or fatmongery); also, hides and skins, and all other Swedish goods, being raw materials, or not made up or manufactured in Sweden, or other countries and cities belonging to Sweden; also, flax, *hemp, [*80 wax, fir building timber, deals, laths, Gottland lime and lime-stones, all sorts of flags and other stones, together with masts, spars, tar, pitch, pot and wood ashes, clap-boards, pipe-staves, peltry, and other Russia leather, and Russian goods, are not herewith understood or prohibited to be exported (i. e., out of Sweden), but are hereby permitted and allowed, so that for the sake of maintaining commerce they may be freely exported by neutral towns and persons, in their ships, by their factors, in the manner aforesaid; and that, on the other hand, they may also freely import into Sweden all sorts of silk articles, cloths, and such like fine shop ware, and current goods, which are not, properly and directly necessary and useful for any purpose of war; but all such free goods as are found or met with, or overtaken in ships that are not free, shall and must after all (without any exception) be subject to confiscation as good prize. According to which our admiralty council board, and servants thereof, and all and every our officers, cruisers, and commanders of ships, having commissions, as well as all others, whether they be our friends, neighbors, or enemies, who are carrying on any commerce and traffic by sea, and are minded to continue the same, during the present war, have to conform themselves, and to beware of losses. Given in our palace at Copenhagen, the 23d of September, in the year 1659, under our seal.

FRIEDERICH.

LIVRE III.—TITRE IX.

SEC. 2. Des Prises.

Art. 3. Défendons à tous nos sujets, de prendre commissions d'aucuns rois, princes ou états étrangers, pour armer des vaisseaux en guerre, et courir la mer sous leur bannière, si ce n'est par notre permission, à peine d'être traités comme pirates.

81* 4. Seront de bonne prise tous vaisseaux appartenants à nos ennemis, ou commandés par des pirates, forbans ou autres gens courant la mer sans commission d'aucun prince ni état souverain.

5. Tout vaisseau combattant sous autre pavillon que celui de l'état dont il a commission, ou ayant commission de deux différens princes ou états, sera aussi de bonne prise; et s'il est armé en guerre, les capitaines et officiers seront punis comme pirates.

6. Seront encore de bonne prise les vaisseaux avec leur chargement, dans lesquels il ne sera trouvé chartes-parties, connoissemens ni factures. Faisons défenses à tous capitaines, officiers et équipages des vaisseaux preneurs, de les soustraire, à peine de punition corporelle.

7. Tous navires qui se trouveront chargés d'effets appartenants à nos ennemis, et les marchandises de nos sujets ou alliés qui se trouveront dans un navire ennemi, seront pareillement de bonne prise.

8. Si aucun navire de nos sujets est repris sur nos ennemis, après qu'il aura demeuré entre leurs mains pendant 24 heures, la prise en sera bonne; et si elle est faite avant les 24 heures, il sera restitué au propriétaire, avec tout ce qui étoit dedans, à la réserve du tiers qui sera donné au navire qui aura fait la recousse.

9. Si le navire, sans être recous, est abandonné par les ennemis, ou si, par tempête ou autre cas fortuit, il revient en la possession de nos sujets, avant qu'il ait été conduit dans aucun port ennemi, il sera rendu au propriétaire qui le réclamera, dans l'an et jour, quoiqu'il ait été plus de 24 heures entre les mains des ennemis.

10. Les navires et effets de nos sujets ou alliés, repris sur les pirates, et réclamés dans l'an et jour de la déclaration qui en aura été faite en l'amirauté, seront rendus aux propriétaires en payant le tiers de la valeur du vaisseau et des marchandises, pour frais de recousse.

11. Les armes, poudres, boulets, et autres munitions de guerre, même les chevaux et équipages qui seront transportés *pour le 82 service de nos ennemis, seront confisqués, en quelque vaisseau qu'ils soient trouvés, et à quelque personne qu'ils appartiennent, soit de nos sujets ou alliés.

12. Tout vaisseau qui refusera d'amener ses voiles, après la semonce qui lui en aura été faite par nos vaisseaux ou ceux de nos sujets armés en guerre, pourra y être contraint par artillerie ou autrement; et en cas de résistance et de combat il sera de bonne prise.

13. Défendons à tous capitaines de vaisseaux armés en guerre, d'arrêter ceux de nos sujets, amis ou alliés, qui auront amené leurs voiles et représenté leur charte-partie ou police de chargement, et d'y prendre ou souffrir être pris aucune chose, à peine de la vie.

14. Aucuns vaisseaux pris par capitaines ayant commission étrangère, ne pourront demeurer plus de vingt-quatre heures dans nos ports et havres, s'ils n'y sont retenus par la tempête, ou si la prise n'a été faite sur nos ennemis.

15. Si dans les prises amenées dans nos ports par les navires de guerre armés sous commission étrangère, il se trouve des marchandises qui soient à nos sujets ou alliés, celles de nos sujets leur seront rendues, et les autres ne pourront être mises en magasin, ni achetées par aucune personne, sous quelque prétexte que ce puisse être.

16. Aussitôt que les capitaines des vaisseaux armés en guerre, se seront rendus maîtres de quelques navires, ils se saisiront des congés, passe-ports, lettres de mer, chartes-parties, connoissemens, et de tous autres papiers concernant la charge et destination du vaisseau, ensemble des clés des coffres, armoires et chambres, et feront fermer les écoutilles et autres lieux où il y aura des marchandises.

17. Enjoignons aux capitaines qui auront fait quelque prise, de l'amener ou envoyer, avec les prisonniers, au port où ils auront armé, à peine de perte de leur droit, et d'amende arbitraire, si ce n'est qu'ils fussent forcés par la tempête ou par les ennemis, de relâcher en quelque autre port; auquel cas ils seront tenus d'en donner incessamment avis aux intéressés à l'armement.

*18. Faisons défenses, à peine de la vie, 83 à tous chefs, soldats et matelots, de couler à fond les vaisseaux pris, et de descendre les prisonniers en des îles ou côtes éloignées, pour celer la prise.

19. Et où les preneurs ne pouvant se charger du vaisseau pris, ni de l'équipage, enlèveraient seulement les marchandises, ou relâcheraient le tout par composition, ils seront tenus de se saisir des papiers, et d'amener, au moins, les deux principaux officiers du vaisseau pris, à peine d'être privés de ce qui leur pourrait appartenir en la prise, même de punition corporelle, s'il y échet.

20. Défendons de faire aucune ouverture des coffres, ballots, sacs, pipes, barriques, tonneaux et armoires; de transporter ni vendre aucunes marchandises de la prise, et à toutes personnes d'en acheter ou receler, jusqu'à ce que la prise ait été jugée, ou qu'il soit ordonné par justice, à peine de restitution du quadruple et de punition corporelle.

21. Aussitôt que la prise aura été amenée en quelques rades ou ports de notre royaume, le capitaine qui l'aura faite, s'il y est en personne, sinon celui qu'il en aura chargé, sera tenu de faire son rapport aux officiers de l'amirauté, de leur représenter et mettre entre les mains les papiers et prisonniers, et de leur déclarer le jour et l'heure que le vaisseau aura été pris, en quel lieu ou à quelle hauteur; si le capitaine a fait refus d'amener les voiles ou de faire voir sa commission ou son congé, s'il a attaqué ou s'il s'est défendu, quel pavillon il portait, et les autres circonstances de la prise et de son voyage.

22. Après la déclaration reçue, les officiers de l'amirauté se transporteront incessamment sur le vaisseau pris, soit qu'il ait mouillé en rade, ou qu'il soit entré dans le port, dresseront procès-verbal de la quantité et qualité des marchandises, et de l'état auquel ils trouveront les chambres, armoires, écoutes, et fond de cale du vaisseau, qu'ils feront ensuite fermer et sceller du sceau de l'amirauté; et ils y établiront des gardes pour veiller à la conservation du scellé et pour empêcher le divertissement des effets.

24. Les officiers de l'amirauté entendront sur le fait de la prise, le maître ou commandant du vaisseau pris, et les principaux de son équipage, même quelques officiers et matelots du preneur, s'il est besoin.

25. Si le vaisseau est amené sans prisonniers, chartes-parties, ni connaissements, les officiers, soldats et équipage de celui qui l'aura pris, seront séparément examinés sur les circonstances de la prise, et pourquoi le navire a été amené sans prisonniers; et seront le vaisseau et les marchandises visitées par experts, pour connaître, s'il se peut, sur qui la prise aura été faite.

26. Si, par la déposition de l'équipage et la visite du vaisseau et des marchandises, on ne peut découvrir sur qui la prise aura été faite, le tout sera inventorié, apprécié, et mis sous bonne et sûre garde, pour être restitué à qui il appartiendra, s'il est réclamé dans l'an et jour, sinon partagé comme épave de mer, également entre nous, l'amiral et les armateurs.

27. S'il est nécessaire, avant le jugement de la prise, de tirer les marchandises du vaisseau, pour en empêcher le dépérissement, il en sera fait inventaire en présence de notre procureur et des parties intéressées, qui le signeront, si elles peuvent signer, pour ensuite être mises sous la garde d'une personne solvable, ou dans des magasins fermant à trois clés différentes, dont l'une sera délivrée aux armateurs, l'autre au receveur de l'amiral, et la troisième aux réclamateurs, si aucun se présente, sinon à notre procureur.

28. Les marchandises qui ne pourront être conservées, seront vendues sur la réquisition des parties intéressées, et adjugées au plus offrant, en présence de notre procureur, à l'issue de l'audience, après trois remises d'enchères, de trois jours en trois jours, les proclamations préalablement faites, et affiches mises en la manière accoutumée.

30. Enjoignons aux officiers de l'amirauté de procéder incessamment à l'exécution des *85 arrêts et jugemens qui interviendront sur le fait des prises, et de faire faire incontinent et sans délai, la délivrance des vaisseaux, marchandises et effets dont la main levée sera ordonnée, à peine d'interdiction, de cinq cents livres d'amende, et de tous dépens, dommages et intérêts.

31. Sera prise, avant partage, la somme à laquelle se trouveront monter les frais du déchargement et de la garde du vaisseau et des marchandises, suivant l'état qui en sera arrêté par le lieutenant de l'amirauté, en présence de notre procureur et des intéressés.

Art. 1. On n'aura aucun égard aux passeports des princes neutres, auxquels ceux qui les auront obtenus se trouveront avoir contrevenu, et ces vaisseaux seront considérés comme étant sans avertissement.

2. Un même passeport ne pourra servir que pour un seul voyage.

3. Les passeports seront considérés comme nuls, quand il y aura preuve que le navire pour lequel ils sont expédiés n'était alors dans aucun des ports du prince qui l'a accordé.

4. Tout vaisseau qui sera de fabrique ennemie, ou qui aura eu originairement un propriétaire ennemi, ne pourra être censé neutre, s'il n'en a été fait une vente pardevant les officiers publics qui doivent passer cette sorte d'actes, et si cette vente ne se trouve à bord, et n'est soutenue d'un pouvoir authentique, donné par le premier propriétaire lorsqu'il ne vend pas lui-même.

5. Les connaissements trouvés à bord, non signés, seront nuls et regardés comme des actes informés.

Sa Majesté étant informée qu'il est survenu quelques contestations à l'occasion du jugement des vaisseaux échoués, soit à l'égard de ceux qui, étant de fabrique ennemie, ne sont pas trouvés munis d'aucun contrat, soit par rapport aux marchandises, sans connaissements, sous prétexte que le règlement du 17 février 1694 paraît n'avoir été fait que pour les vaisseaux pris, et que l'article de l'ordonnance de 1684, qui confisque les marchandises sans connaissement, est inséré dans le titre des prises; à quoi Sa Majesté désirant pourvoir, en sorte que les vaisseaux marqués, et les marchandises véritablement ennemies, mais souvent réclamées par des sujets des princes neutres, ne puissent être soustraits, en aucuns cas, à la juste confiscation établie par les lois de la guerre, et par les ordonnances anciennes et nouvelles; Sa Majesté a ordonné et ordonne que les vaisseaux qui échoueront sur les côtes, et qui seront portés par la tempête ou autrement, seront jugés suivant les articles de l'ordonnance de 1681, insérés dans le titre des prises, et le règlement du 17 février 1694; ce faisant, que tout vaisseau échoué qui sera de fabrique ennemie, ou qui aura eu originellement un propriétaire ennemi, ne pourra être censé neutre, mais sera confisqué en entier au profit de Sa Majesté, s'il n'en a été fait une vente pardevant les officiers publics qui doivent passer ces sortes d'actes, et si cette vente ne se trouve à bord et n'est accompagnée d'un pouvoir authentique, donné par le premier propriétaire lorsqu'il ne vend pas lui-même. Ordonne pareillement Sa Majesté, que les marchandises chargées sur les vaisseaux échoués, dont il ne se trouvera à bord aucun connaissement, seront et demeureront entièrement confisquées à son profit; n'entend néanmoins Sa Majesté comprendre dans la présente ordonnance, les vaisseaux échoués, dont les papiers se seraient perdus à l'occasion de la tempête et par le malheur du naufrage, en cas que le capitaine ou le commandant en fasse d'abord sa déclaration, et que 87* l'état *du vaisseau, et les circonstances de l'échouement, le faire présumer ainsi; auquel cas, Sa Majesté ordonne que les réclamateurs seront seulement tenus de rapporter une nouvelle expédition du contrat d'achat, et le double des connaissements.

Art. 1. Fait Sa Majesté défense aux armateurs Français, d'arrêter en mer, et d'amener dans les ports de son royaume, les navires appartenant aux sujets des princes neutres, sortis d'un des ports de leur domination, et chargés pour le compte des sujets des dits princes neutres, de marchandises du crû ou fabrique de leur pays, pour les porter en droiture en quelque état que ce soit, même en ceux avec qui Sa Majesté est en guerre, pourvu néanmoins qu'il n'y ait sur les dits navires aucunes marchandises de contrebande.

2. Leur fait pareillement défenses d'arrêter les navires appartenant aux sujets des princes neutres, sortis de quelque autre état que ce soit, même de ceux avec lesquels Sa Majesté est en guerre, et chargés pour le compte des dits sujets des princes neutres, de marchandises qu'ils auront prises dans le pays ou état d'où ils seront partis, pour s'en retourner en droiture dans un des ports de la domination de leur souverain.

3. Comme aussi leur fait défenses d'arrêter les navires appartenant aux sujets des princes neutres, partis des ports d'un état neutre ou allié de Sa Majesté, pourvu qu'ils ne soient chargés de marchandises du crû ou fabrique de ses ennemis, auquel cas les marchandises seront de bonne prise et les navires relâchés.

4. Défend pareillement Sa Majesté, aux dits armateurs, d'arrêter les navires appartenant aux sujets des dits princes neutres, sortis des ports d'un état allié de Sa Majesté, ou neutre, pour aller dans un port d'un état ennemi de Sa Majesté, pourvu qu'il n'y ait sur les dits navires aucunes marchandises de contrebande, ni du crû ou fabrique de Sa Majesté, dans lequel 88* cas les dites marchandises seront de bonne prise, et les navires seront relâchés,

5. Si dans les cas expliqués par les articles 1, 2, 3, et 4 de ce règlement, il se trouvait sur les dits navires neutres, de quelque nation qu'ils fussent, des marchandises ou effets appartenant aux ennemis de Sa Majesté, les marchandises ou effets seront de bonne prise, quand même elles ne seraient pas de fabrique du pays ennemi, et néanmoins les navires relâchés.

6. Tous connaissements trouvés à bord, non signés, seront nuls et regardés comme actes informés.

Art. 1. Fait défenses, Sa Majesté, à tous armateurs, d'arrêter et de conduire dans les ports du royaume les navires des puissances neutres, quand même ils sortiraient des ports ennemis, ou qu'ils y seraient destinés, à l'exception toutefois de ceux qui porteraient des secours à des places bloquées, investies ou assiégées. A l'égard des navires des états neutres, qui seraient chargés de marchandises de contrebande destinées à l'ennemi, ils pourront être arrêtés, et les dites marchandises seront saisies et confisquées; mais les bâtiments et le surplus de leur cargaison seront relâchés, à moins que les dites marchandises de contrebande ne composent les trois quarts de la valeur du chargement; auquel cas les navires et la cargaison seront confisquées en entier. Se réservant au surplus, Sa Majesté, de révoquer la liberté portée au présent article, si les puissances ennemies n'accordent pas le réciprocque dans le délai de six mois, à compter du jour de la publication du présent règlement.<sup>1</sup>

2. Les maîtres des bâtiments neutres seront tenus de justifier sur mer de leur propriété neutre par les passeports, connaissements, factures et autres pièces de bord, l'une desquelles au moins constatera la propriété neutre, ou en contiendra une *énonciation précise; et [89 quant aux chartes-parties et autres pièces qui ne seraient pas signées, veut Sa Majesté qu'elles soient regardées comme nulles et de nul effet.

3. Tous vaisseaux pris, de quelque nation qu'ils soient, neutres ou alliés, desquels il sera constaté qu'il y a en des papiers jetés à la mer, ou autrement supprimés ou distraits, seront déclarés de bonne prise avec leurs cargaisons, sur la seule preuve des papiers jetés à la mer, et sans qu'il soit besoin d'examiner quels étaient ces papiers, par qui ils ont été jetés, et s'il en est resté suffisamment à bord pour justifier que le navire et son chargement appartiennent à des amis ou alliés.

4. Un passeport ou congé ne pourra servir que pour un seul voyage, et sera réputé nul, s'il est prouvé que le bâtiment pour lequel il aurait été expédié n'était, au moment de l'expédition, dans aucun des ports du prince qui l'a accordé.

5. Ou n'aura aucun égard aux passeports des puissances neutres, lorsque ceux qui les auront obtenus se trouveront y avoir contrevenu, ou lorsque les passeports exprimeront un nom de bâtiment différent de l'énonciation qui en sera faite dans les autres pièces de bord, à moins que les preuves du changement de nom avec l'identité du bâtiment, ne fassent partie de ces mêmes pièces, et qu'elles aient été reçues par des officiers publics du lieu du départ, et enregistrées par devant le principal officier public du lieu.

6. On n'aura pareillement égard aux passe-ports accordés par les puissances neutres, ou alliées, tant aux propriétaires qu'aux maîtres des bâtimens, sujets des états ennemis de Sa Majesté, s'ils n'ont été naturalisés ou s'ils n'ont transféré leur domicile dans les états des dites puissances, trois mois avant le premier septembre de la présente année; et ne pourront les dits propriétaires et maîtres de bâtimens, sujets des états ennemis, qui auront obtenu les dites lettres de neutralité, jouir de leur effet, si depuis qu'elles ont été obtenues, ils sont retournés dans les états ennemis de Sa Majesté pour y continuer leur commerce.

7. Les bâtimens de fabrique ennemie, ou qui auraient eu un propriétaire ennemi, ne pourront 90* être réputés neutres ou alliés, s'il n'est trouvé à bord quelques pièces authentiques, passées devant des officiers publics, qui puissent en assurer la date, et qui justifient que la vente ou cession en a été faite à quelqu'un des sujets des puissances alliées ou neutres, avant le commencement des hostilités, et si le dit acte translatif de propriété de l'ennemi, au sujet neutre ou allié, n'a été dûment enregistré pardevant le principal officier du lieu du départ, et signé du propriétaire ou du porteur de ses pouvoirs.

8. A l'égard des bâtimens de fabrique ennemie qui auront été pris par les vaisseaux de Sa Majesté, ceux de ses alliés ou de ses sujets, pendant la guerre, et qui auront ensuite été vendus aux sujets des états alliés ou neutres, ils ne pourront être réputés de bonne prise s'il ne se trouve à bord des actes en bonne forme, passés pardevant les officiers publics à ce préposés, justificatifs tant de la prise que de la vente ou adjudication qui en aurait été faite ensuite aux sujets des dits états alliés ou neutres, soit en France, soit dans les ports des états alliés; faute desquelles pièces justificatives tant de la prise que de la vente, les dits bâtimens seront de bonne prise.

9. Seront de bonne prise tous bâtimens étrangers sur lesquels il y aura un subrécargue marchand, commis ou officier major d'un pays ennemi de Sa Majesté, ou dont l'équipage sera composé au-delà du tiers de matelots sujets des états ennemis de Sa Majesté, ou qui n'auront pas à bord le rôle d'équipage arrêté par les officiers publics des lieux neutres d'où les bâtimens seront partis.

10. N'entend Sa Majesté comprendre dans les dispositions du précédent article, les navires dont les capitaines ou les maîtres justifieront, par les actes trouvés à bord, qu'ils ont été obligés de prendre les officiers majors ou matelots, dans les ports où ils auront relâché, pour remplacer ceux du pays neutre qui seront morts dans le cours du voyage.

11. Veut Sa Majesté, que, dans aucun cas, les pièces qui pourraient être rapportées après la prise des bâtimens, puissent faire aucune foi, ni être d'aucune utilité, tant aux propriétaires des dits bâtimens qu'à ceux des marchands 91* dises qui pourraient y avoir été chargées; voulant Sa Majesté qu'en toutes occasions, l'on n'ait égard qu'aux seules pièces trouvées à bord.

12. Tous navires des puissances neutres, sortis des ports du royaume, qui n'auront à bord d'autres denrées et marchandises que celles qui y auront été chargées, et qui se trouveront munis de congés de l'amiral de France, ne pourront être arrêtés par les armateurs Français, ni ramenés par eux dans les ports du royaume sous quelque prétexte que ce puisse être.

13. En cas de contravention de la part des armateurs Français aux dispositions du présent règlement, il sera fait main levée des bâtimens et des marchandises qui composent leur chargement, autres toutefois que celles sujettes à confiscation, et les dits armateurs seront condamnés en tels dommages et intérêts qu'il appartiendra.

14. Ordonne Sa Majesté que les dispositions du présent règlement auront lieu pour les navires qui auraient échoué sur les côtes dépendant de ses possessions.

15. Veut au surplus Sa Majesté, que les dispositions du titre des prises de l'ordonnance de la marine, du mois d'Août 1681, soient exécutées selon leur forme et teneur, en tout ce à quoi il n'aura pas été dérogé par le présent règlement.

DANISH PRIZE INSTRUCTIONS OF 1810.

We, Frederick the Sixth, by the grace of God, King of Denmark and Norway, the Wends and Goths, Duke of Sleswick, Holstein, Stormarn, Ditmarsk, and Oldenburg, make known:

That whereas we find it corresponding with circumstances to renew the acts for privateering from our dominions, which for some time had been stopped, and to establish new regulations, according to which prize cases are to be acted and decided upon, we hereby do publish such rules, recalling our former will of 24th of September, 1807, concerning privateering and the lawful decision of prizes.

SEC. 1. No person or persons within our dominions are permitted *to act as privateer [*92 without being furnished with a lawful commission for this purpose.

Such commissions are henceforth to be issued out from the Royal Board of Admiralty, and are to be furnished with the seal of the said court. Such commissions to be granted to none but such persons as either by birth or naturalization have acquired the privileges of Danish citizens, or to other ships or vessels but such as carry guns, or the crew of which at least are furnished with weapons.

2. Every ship or vessel that proceeds to sea on privateering, is to be commanded by a person who is skillful in navigation, and who, before he is entrusted with his commission, has signed his name upon oath to these regulations, and promised to obey them, as well as any other orders communicated to him, through our Royal Board of Admiralty.

3. The commissions for privateers are to be to the following purport:

“According to His Majesty's most gracious orders, it is hereby made known to all persons concerned, that —, owner of the ship or vessel —, burden — lasts according to the royal bill, dated the 28th of March, 1810, has obtained permission to fit out the said ship or vessel commanded by — in order to cruise against our enemies (being furnished with guns or other weapons), for the purpose of capturing, or if necessary, destroying all ships or vessels belonging to the crown of Great Britain or its subjects, or of stopping and carrying in, in order to be lawfully examined, such ships as are suspected to belong to the said power, or to be connected with it, in a manner incompatible with the laws of neutrality. The owner has deposited the security ordered, and the commander has declared upon his sacred oath to obey the royal orders issued out for privateering, as well as such others as may be given from the Royal Board of Admiralty for this purpose.

The Royal Board of Admiralty, Copenhagen.
Signed and sealed.

4. Petitions to obtain commissions for privateering are to be *sent in to the magistrate of that place whence the ship or vessel destined for privateering is to be fitted out.

He who obtains such a commission ought, as security for such damage as might be occasioned by an illicit use made of the commission, to find bail to the magistrate for a certain sum from 1,000 to 15,000 rix dollars. The magistrate in fixing this sum is to take reference to the number of the crew of the ship, so that security, at all events, be given to the amount of 1,000 rix dollars, but as to the rest, that the sum of 100 rix dollars is computed for each man on board.

Further are the owners as well as the commander (the former with the vessel, the latter with his person and property), responsible for all such damage that may be done to the ship captured.

5. Those privateers to whom lawful commissions have been granted, are allowed to carry the royal Danish pendant and ensign, with our royal cipher in the middle of it, referring ourselves as to the rest, to the regulations ordered in the bill of the 11th of January, 1748.

6. The privateer is bound, as far as it lies in his power, to take and carry in for condemnation all such ships and vessels as belong to and are proved to be the property of the subjects of the crown of Great Britain.

He is also permitted to bring in for examination every other ship or vessel, the neutrality of which, according to the 10th section of these regulations, is not lawfully proved, or against which grounded suspicions may be formed upon any of the reasons mentioned in the 12th section.

Further, he is authorized to carry in all such ships as may have passed the Sound or the Belt, without paying the duty ordered, and which consequently have no certificate; the penalty (being the double of the duty ordered) to be forfeited to him.

7. No privateer is allowed (under punishment of losing his commission, or any other punishment according to circumstances) to stop any ship or make any use of his commission within the territories of a friendly or neutral power, which generally are supposed to reach one league from shore.

94*] *With regard to privateering at Oresound, it is to be observed, that the privateers must avoid approaching the Swedish batteries or shore so near that they might be reached by their guns.

8. As we acknowledge as an inevitable rule that free ships constitute free goods, we hereby most positively forbid every cruiser furnished with commission as privateer, to capture any ship belonging to powers that are neutral or in friendly relation with us (whomsoever the cargo may belong to), provided the papers regarding the ship or the expedition are in proper order, and the ship has no contraband of war on board, bound to any country belonging to His Britannic Majesty, nor be under any of those predicaments mentioned in the sixth section as subject to condemnation.

9. As free ship constitutes free cargo, thus, on the other hand, hostile ship constitutes hostile cargo.

10. The ship's papers, which, according to the eighth section, ought to be in proper order, are the following:

The sea passport issued out by the government of that country whereof the ship's owner is a subject, or by a magistrate authorized by such government. Instead of this document, however, any other legal document, proving that the commander, by that government whose real subject he is, mediate or immediate, is authorized to use that neutral flag he sails under on his present voyage, shall be accepted of and credited.

The bill of sale or purchase of the ship, in case he that had the ship built disposed of her to another, then both documents (as well that of her building as that of the purchase) are requisite, provided both circumstances be not mentioned in one and the same document. In case the ship formerly had been captured as prize, as such condemned, then the act of condemnation serves in lieu as well of the document stating where the ship was built as of the bill of purchase; this is, however, upon a condition that a proper document of the auction held over the ship, or any other proper document proving the lawful disposal of her, is annexed to the act of condemnation.

To ships which, after having been formerly condemned in a foreign state, and to those bought by neutral citizens, proceeding thence *only with ballast home, the act of condemnation, with the document of this auction, or any other document, of her being transferred to another person, ought to be a full substitute in lieu of the other papers ordered, the ship's journal excepted.

Bill of gauge, which must be issued out by the officer appointed to measure ships at the place where the ship is stated to belong to; it must agree with the passport, or, which is instead of it.

The list or roll of the crew properly certified by the respective officers; a full and clear account of all the persons found on board, and not stated in the roll, is also requisite. This list also must prove, that neither the captain, mate, supercargo, factor, commissioner, nor more than one-third part of the crew, are British subjects.

The receipt for having paid the duty or custom; this document is also to state where the cargo was shipped, and whither it was bound;

The charter-party or bill of lading, or if no charter-party was written, then only the bill of lading, which ought to state whither the ship was bound; and, finally,

The ship's journal of the whole voyage mentioned in the passport, with an exception of such ships which only sail from one port in the Baltic to another.

11. As good and lawful prizes are to be considered:

All such ships as evidently belong to the crown of Great Britain, or to subjects of His Britannic Majesty, in whatever part of the world they may reside.

Such ships as carry on a smuggling trade to or from Great Britain, or the countries which are under the dominions of the said power, by feigned and forged papers of clearance, as well outward as homeward bound, sail to the above-mentioned countries from such places wherein no clearance is allowed, or from these countries to a place where no admittance from thence is allowed.

Such ships as either entirely or partly are loaded with contrabands of war, and which are proved to be bound to harbors in Great Britain, or which have on board officers or privates that 96* are engaged, or are to be engaged, in the service of the enemy, as well as such ships that might approach a squadron which blockades a Danish city or harbor, or province, in order to trade with the enemy for provisions or refreshments.

Such ships, the crew of which with force oppose the examination of the privateer. In like manner those ships that, notwithstanding their flag is considered neutral, as well with regard to Great Britain as the powers in war with the same nation, still either in the Atlantic or Baltic, have made use of English convoy.

Such Danish, Norwegian, or, relative to Great Britain, hostile ship, which, after having been captured by the enemy, is recaptured, a third part of the value of the ship and cargo thus recaptured, is due to the captor, whether such ship be taken before or after the expiration of the space of twenty-four hours, the two-thirds to be returned to the owner. If such ships, on the contrary, are recaptured, which as well with regard to us as to the enemy, are neutral, the recaptor is to be paid an equivalent for his danger and trouble according to the decision of the court of justice.

12. As suspected and subject to a further examination may be brought in:

Such ships as are not furnished with the documents mentioned in the tenth section.

Such ships as have double papers or documents, which according to appearance are false.

Such ships, from which papers have been thrown overboard, or by other means destroyed, particularly if this has taken place after the privateer was within sight.

Those ships, the commanders of which have refused to comply with the privateer's request to open such recesses, wherein contraband of war, or documents relating to the expedition of the ship, are suspected to be concealed.

Ships under the above-named predicaments are to be treated according to the preceding sections, provided the suspicion against them be not removed by authentic proofs of their neutrality and lawful destination.

97* *13. As contraband of war (as mentioned in the 11th section), are to be considered: guns, mortars, and all kinds of weapons, pistols, bombs, grenades, balls, firelocks, flintstones, matches, gunpowder, saltpetre, sulphur, breast plates, swords, bandoliers, cartouches, saddles, and bridles; such articles as the Wheat. 5.

U. S., Book 5.

above-mentioned, however, excepted, as are necessary to the defense of the ship and crew.

When the privateer meets a ship that sails under a friendly or neutral flag, he is to hail the commander in order to make him come on board with his ship's documents.

If these are in proper order, he is directly to suffer the ship to proceed on her voyage, without demanding anything of whatever nature.

If, on the contrary, he finds ground to suspect unfair dealing, he is allowed to go on board the vessel to examine her more thoroughly.

14. During this examination, he must not venture to break open any drawers, chests, trunks, barrels, casks, or anything else, wherein the cargo may be put up, nor in any wrongful manner investigate into such part of the cargo that may lay scattered about in the ship; but when he has a suspicion of contraband of war or suspicious papers being concealed anywhere, he is to order the commander to open such recesses which are supposed to contain them, and afterwards again to lock them.

That privateer who acts contrary to these orders, is to pay the damage, forfeit his commission, and besides be punished according to the circumstances.

15. If a privateer brings in a ship, he is forbid, under the same penalty as mentioned in the 14th section, to unload, sell, change, or in any other way to dispose of, or part with, any part of the cargo, but he ought, in concert with the captain, purser, or mate of the ship captured, as far as possible, to seal and lock up the whole of the cargo unopened (as far as the preservation of the cargo does not require the contrary), until his arrival at any of those places that are mentioned afterwards.

17. In case of necessity, he is permitted to take victuals and *ammunition out of the [*98 ship captured, but he is to give the master of her a list of it, signed by himself.

If the ship carried in afterwards be condemned in his favor, what has been thus taken away is to be deducted from his share; but in case the ship be not condemned, he is to refund in money what has been taken out of the ship.

18. All papers, passports, letters and journals, the privateer, after having perused them, shall be obliged to put up and seal, to which the master of the ship adds his. They remain in the possession of the privateer unopened until they may be delivered up to the magistrate of the place where the ship is brought in.

19. The privateer is to proceed to sea from a harbor within our dominions; the prizes he may happen to make during the expedition, are to be carried to such a toll-place in Denmark, Norway, Sleswick, or Holstein, as he may find most convenient, or to the nearest place where he may be protected by military force, but to no foreign places, at the risk of losing his commission and the sum deposited as security, unless he is forced to do so by stress of weather, for want of provisions, or by being pursued by the enemy; and if this be the case, he shall be bound (without meanwhile breaking the bulk) to proceed with the first favorable wind to a custom-place within our dominions.

20. If the cargo, however, consists of goods, which, according to their nature, easily are spoiled, or the ship through average cannot proceed on her voyage, he is permitted to apply to the magistrate of the place where he enters, in case it be within our dominions, and in foreign countries, to the nearest Danish consul, who are to take such measures as are the most proper for the preservation of the ship and cargo.

21. As soon as the privateer enters into any harbor within our dominions with a prize, he is directly to apply to the judge of the place, who immediately, and at farthest within 24 hours, is to undertake and finish the examination, as well of the privateer and her crew, as of the master of the ship captured, together with the crew and passengers; he is minutely to examine and cross-examine them about the ship's course according to the journal and other circumstances; he is to investigate into the authenticity <sup>99*</sup> of the ship's documents mentioned in the 10th section, the passports of the passengers, their situation on board, voyage and errand, as well as the place where the ship was seized, the conduct of the privateer before, under and after the capture, and, in short, he is to examine into everything necessary to the illustration of the case.

22. During the proceeding, it is the duty of the judge in general to consider the interest of both parties in the most careful manner, and before the final decision, summon as well the privateer as in particular the master of the ship captured, to declare whether they wish for any farther illustrations, or have anything farther to observe, upon which he is to receive and to reflect upon the claims of both parties.

The utmost attention and zeal in this respect are hereby inculcated on all judges, the more so, as, in order to promote the quick expedition and discharge of justice, so necessary in legal proceedings (and in particular for the ship captured that may expect a release), we have suffered the parties to meet by proxies before the High Court of Admiralty.

23. The judge, attended by two citizens residing at the place, duly sworn, is to take down a true inventory, and it is to be observed, that this is to be taken of the cargo according to the contents of the ship's documents, and no unloading to take place unless the privateer insists upon it, or the judge has grounded suspicions of unfair dealing which might be discovered by the unshipping, or other circumstances might render it necessary for the preservation of the cargo.

24. This being observed, and the case by the respective judges discussed, so far that sentence at the prize court may be pronounced, the proceedings of the court ought to be taken by the secretary, and to be sent by a speedy messenger to the said court, together with the inventory and the rest of the documents. The judge then informs both parties that the case will be decided upon by the prize court as soon as possible, and that no further summons before that court will take place.

25. To judge of prize cases in the first instance, we have appointed:

100* A prize court for the islands of Zealand, Lolland, Falster, Moen, and neighboring islands (the Island of Samsøe excepted). It is held at Copenhagen:

One for the northern parts of Jutland, and the dioceses of Fyon and Samsøe, this is held at Aarhus.

One for the dukedoms of Sleswick and Holstein, held at Flensburg.

One for each of our provinces of our kingdom of Norway, held in the capital of the respective province.

One for the islands of Bornholm and Christiansøe held at Ronne.

Each of these courts to be constituted of a justitiarius (president) and two assessors, among whom an officer of our navy.

A secretary is appointed at each of these courts.

26. If the prize court finds any further illustrations necessary in a case, the court ought to charge the judge who has held the examination, to procure such as may be wanted.

27. At the making up of the sentence, every circumstance ought most minutely to be considered; no other letters or proofs, however, ought to be taken into consideration, but such as were found on board the ship when she was captured, as it is only left to the High Court of Admiralty to decide how far any of the parties may be allowed to produce farther evidence or proofs.

The final issue of the sentence of the prize court, is to be published in the official journal of the province, by the secretary of the court; the sentence itself, upon the demand of the parties, is immediately to be copied and delivered to them for their further use.

28. If any of the parties wish to appeal from the sentence of the prize court, he ought to declare such intention, within twenty-four hours after the annunciation of the sentence, to his opponent, and afterwards within the space of eight weeks procure summons from the High Court of Admiralty, which is held in our royal residence, Copenhagen, and give proper warning to the judge and his opponent, agreeably to the bill of April 30th, 1806, containing the instructions for the High Court of Admiralty.

*The summons of appeal in Zealand [101] are applied for in the High Court of Admiralty. Out of Zealand, the chief magistrates, and at Bornholm, and at Christiansøe, the governors are authorized to issue out such summons in behalf of the High Court of Admiralty.

When the case is decided by the said court, no further appeal is granted.

29. If a privateer bring in a ship for any other causes than those authorized in this our royal bill, he is not only to defray all the expenses of the case, but moreover to repay all the damage suffered by the ship on account of this seizure.

If, on the contrary, the capture is upon probable cause, the privateer is without any responsibility, though the ship, upon the ground of certain circumstances, is released; in this case, the expenses arising from the case and capture are to be defrayed out of the ship.

If any of the parties, without any sufficient ground, appeal from the sentence pronounced, he may expect (if his opponent insists upon it) to be sentenced to pay the loss he thereby may have suffered, beside the expenses of the lawsuit.

30. When any ship captured is condemned in favor of the captor, he is not allowed to dispose of the ship and cargo according to pleasure, but both parts are to be sold generally at the place where the ship is brought in. Out of the amount of the sale, beside the usual salary, one per centum is to be paid to the hospital of invalid sailors at Copenhagen, which sum it is the duty of the judge to receive and transmit to the direction of the said institution, receiving their acquittance.

31. The privateers are exempt from paying the usual duty; no clearance of duty is consequently requisite at their setting out; at their return they need only to announce their arrival at the custom-house, in order that it may be ascertained they import no goods. Out of the goods, on the contrary, which are carried in and condemned, all duties of every denomination are to be paid, similar to other goods imported.

32. The expenses before the court in prize cases we have fixed in a particular bill for this 102* purpose; in the like manner *we have ordered the sum to be paid for commissions of privateering.

33. Every captor of a ship, either hostile or suspected, is to provide for the victualing the crew, from the time of the capture till the sentence of the prize court is pronounced; the expenses to be defrayed out of the ship, when the case is closed.

In the like manner, and upon the same condition, the victualing of the crew of the ship captured, while the case is pending before the High Court of Admiralty, is to be furnished by the captor, provided the sentence of the prize court be appealed from by the captor. The captor, on the contrary, if he has gained the case before the prize court, and appeal is made by the captured, is not bound to feed the crew, unless the master of the ship gives full security for the expenses paid on this account.

34. The magistrate of the place is to receive and deliver up to the nearest fort, such of the crew of a ship captured and condemned, as are subjects of the British crown, where they are considered as prisoners of war; as far as they prove to be subjects of neutral or friendly powers, they are to be delivered up to their respective consuls.

35. We do hereby forbid our magistrates, or other officers to whom we have entrusted the execution of these our orders, or who are employed in the proceedings or decision of prize cases, to partake in any expedition of privateering. Nor must any auctioneer, who is commissioned to sell any ship or cargo condemned, buy them on his own account.

36. A copy of these regulations and instructions for privateers to be on board of every privateer.

These are our will and orders, according to which everyone is to conform.

Given at our royal residence of Copenhagen, 10th March, 1810.

Under our royal hand and seal. (L. S.)

6. That in all cases an appeal shall be allowed to the Congress, or such person or persons as they shall appoint for the trial of appeals; provided the appeal be demanded within five days after definitive sentence, and such appeal be lodged with the Secretary of Congress within forty days afterwards; and provided the party appealing shall give security to prosecute the said appeal to effect; and in case of the death of the secretary during the recess of Congress, then the said appeal to be lodged in Congress within twenty days after the meeting thereof.

7. That when any vessel or vessels shall be fitted out at the expense of any private person or persons, then the captures made shall be to the use of the owner or owners of the said vessel or vessels; that where the vessels employed in the capture shall be fitted out at the expense of any of the United Colonies, then one-third of the prize taken shall be to the use of the captors, and the remaining two-thirds to the use of the said colony; and where the vessels so employed shall be fitted out at the continental charge, then one-third shall go to the captors, and the remaining two-thirds to the use of the United Colonies; provided, nevertheless, that if the capture be a vessel of war, then the cap-

112]* Instructions to the captains and commanders of private armed vessels, which shall have commissions or letters of marque and reprisal.

1. You may, by force of arms, attack, subdue, and take all ships and other vessels belonging to the crown of Great Britain, or any of the subjects thereof, on the high seas, or between high water and low water-marks (except the ships or vessels, together with their cargoes, belonging to any inhabitant or inhabitants of Bermuda, and such other ships and vessels bringing persons with intent to settle and reside within the United States, which you shall suffer to pass unmolested, the commanders thereof permitting a peaceable search and giving satisfactory information of the contents of the lading, and destination of the voyages). And you may also annoy the enemy by all the means in your power, by land as well as by water, taking care not to infringe or violate the laws of nations or the laws of neutrality.

2. You are to pay a sacred regard to the rights of neutral powers, and the usage and custom of civilized nations, and on no pretence whatever presume to take or seize any ships or vessels belonging to the subjects of princes or powers in alliance with these United States, except they are employed in carrying contraband goods or soldiers to our enemies; and in such case you are to conform to the stipulations contained in the treaties subsisting between such princes or powers and these states; and you are not to capture, seize, or plunder any ships or vessels of our enemies, being under the protection of neutral coasts, nations, or princes, under the pains and penalties expressed in a proclamation issued by Congress the 9th day of May, Anno Domini 1778.

3. You shall bring such ships and vessels as you shall take, with their guns, rigging, tackle, apparel, furniture and lading, to some convenient port or ports, that proceedings may thereupon be had in due form of law concerning such captures.

4. You shall send the master, or pilot, and one or more principal *person or persons [*113 of the company of every ship or vessel by you taken in such ship or vessel, as soon after the capture as may be, to be by the judge or judges of such court as aforesaid examined upon oath, and make answers to such interrogatories as may be propounded touching the interest or property of the ship, or vessels, and her lading; and, at the same time, you shall deliver, or cause to be delivered, to the judge or judges, all, passes, sea-briefs, charter-parties, bills of lading, cockets, letters, and other documents and writings found on board, proving the said papers by the affidavit of yourself, or of some other person present at the capture, to be produced as they were received, without fraud, addition, subduction or embezzlement.

5. You shall keep and preserve every ship or vessel, and cargo, by you taken, until they shall, by sentence of a court properly authorized, be adjudged lawful prize, or acquitted, not selling, spoiling, wasting, or diminishing the same or breaking the bulk thereof, nor suffering any such thing to be done.

6. If you, or any of your officers or crew, shall, in cold blood, kill or maim, or by torture or otherwise, cruelly, inhumanly, and contrary to common usage, and the practice of civilized nations in war, treat any person or persons surprised in the ship or vessel you shall take, the offender shall be severely punished.

7. You shall, by all convenient opportunities, send to the board of admiralty, written accounts of the captures you shall make, with the number and names of the captives, and intelligence of what may occur, or be discovered concerning the designs of the enemy, and the destinations, motions, and operations of their fleets and armies.

8. One-third, at least, of your whole company, shall be landsmen.

9. You shall not ransom or discharge any prisoners or captives, but you are to take the utmost care to bring them into port; and if, from any necessity, you shall be obliged to dismiss any prisoners at sea, you shall, on your return from your cruise, make report thereof on oath to the judge of the admiralty of the state to which you belong, or in which you arrive,

And you are to deliver, at your expense, or the expense of your owners, the prisoners you shall bring into port, to a commissary of prisoners nearest the place of their landing, or into the nearest county jail.

10. You shall observe all such further instructions as Congress shall hereafter give in the premises, when you shall have notice thereof.

11. If you shall do anything contrary to these instructions, or to others hereafter to be given, or willingly suffer such thing to be done, you shall not only forfeit your commission, and be liable to an action for breach of the condition of your bond, but be responsible to the party grieved for damages sustained by such malversation.

Resolved, That the board of admiralty be empowered, and directed to cause to be printed, so many copies of said forms as they shall judge necessary.

Resolved, That the President transmit to the governors or presidents of the respective states, so many copies of the said forms as the board of admiralty shall advise, and at the same time inform them, that it is the intention of Congress, that all commissions and instructions now in force, be cancelled as soon as possible, and commissions, bonds, and instructions of the new form be substituted in place thereof.

The motion of Mr. Madison was again taken into consideration, and thereupon the following ordinance was passed:

An Ordinance relative to the capture and condemnation of Prizes.

The United States in Congress assembled, taking into consideration the implacable war waged against them by the King of Great Britain, and judging it inconsistent with their dignity, as a free and independent nation, any longer to continue indulgencies and exemptions to any of the subjects of their enemy, who is obstinately bent upon their destruction or subjugation, have thought it proper to ordain and order, and it is hereby ordained and ordered, that henceforward general reprisals be granted 115*] *against the ships, goods, and subjects of the King of Great Britain; so that, as well the fleets and ships of these United States, as also all other ships and vessels commissioned by letters of marque or general reprisals, or otherwise, by the authority of the United States in Congress assembled, shall, and may lawfully seize all ships, vessels, and goods, belonging to the King or crown of Great Britain, or to his subjects, or others inhabiting within any of the territories or possessions of the aforesaid King of Great Britain, and bring them to judgment in any of the courts of admiralty that now are, or hereafter may be, established in any of these United States, by the authority of the United States in Congress assembled; and the said courts of admiralty are hereby authorized and required, to take cognizance of, and judicially to proceed upon, all, and all manner of captures, seizures, prizes, and reprisals of all ships and goods that are, or shall be taken, and to hear and determine the same, and, according Wheat. 5.

to the course of admiralty, and the laws of nations, to adjudge and condemn all such ships, vessels, and goods, as shall belong to the King of Great Britain, or to his subjects, or to any others inhabiting within any of the countries, territories, or dominions, or possessions, of the aforesaid King of Great Britain.

And that the board of admiralty, or secretary of marine, forthwith prepare, and lay before the United States in Congress assembled, a draught of instructions, for such ships or vessels as shall be commissioned for the purposes above mentioned.

And it is hereby further ordained, that the destruction of papers, or the possession of double papers, by any captured vessel shall be deemed and taken as just cause for the condemnation of such captured vessel; and that, when any prize, having been taken and possessed by the enemy twenty-four hours, shall be retaken from them, the whole of such recaptured prize shall be condemned for the use of the recaptors; but in cases where the prize shall have continued in the possession of the enemy less than twenty-four hours, it shall be restored to the original owner or owners, except one-third part of the *true value thereof, which shall be allowed as salvage to the recaptors. [*116]

And it is hereby further ordained, that the citizens and inhabitants of these United States be, and they hereby are, strictly enjoined and required to abstain from all intercourse, correspondence, or dealings whatsoever, with the subjects of the said King of Great Britain, while at open war with these United States, as they will answer the same at their peril; and the executives of the several states are hereby called upon to take the most vigilant and effectual measures for detecting and suppressing such intercourse, correspondence, or dealings, and bringing the authors thereof, or those concerned therein, to condign punishment.

And in order the more effectually to remove every colorable pretense for continuing such intercourse, it is hereby ordained, that from and after the first day of November next, no benefit shall be claimed from, nor countenance or regard paid to, any letters of passport or safe conduct, heretofore granted by the Congress of the United States, to any of the citizens or inhabitants thereof, or to any person or persons whatever, for the removal of their property or effects from places within the dominions or possessions of the said King of Great Britain.

Provided always, that this ordinance shall not extend to authorize the capture or condemnation of any vessel belonging to any inhabitant of Bermudas, which, being loaded with salt only, may arrive in any of these United States, on or before the first day of May next.

And it is hereby ordained, that all former acts or resolutions of Congress, contrary to the tenor, true intent, and meaning of this ordinance, be, and they are hereby repealed.

Saturday, April 7th, 1781.

On a report of a committee, consisting of Mr. Varnum, Mr. Bee, and Mr. Van Dyke, to

117*] whom was referred the draught of *instructions to the captains of private armed vessels, reported by the board of admiralty:<sup>1</sup>

Be it ordained, and it is hereby ordained, by the United States in Congress assembled, that the following instructions be observed by the captains or commanders of private armed vessels, commissioned by letters of marque or general reprisals, or otherwise, by the authority of the United States in Congress assembled.

First. You may by force of arms, attack, subdue, and seize all ships, vessels, and goods, belonging to the King or crown of Great Britain, or to his subjects, or others inhabiting within any of the territories or possessions of the aforesaid King of Great Britain, on the high seas, or between high water and low water-marks. And you may also annoy the enemy by all means in your power, by land as well as by water, taking care not to infringe or violate the laws of nations, or laws of neutrality.

Second. You are to pay a sacred regard to the rights of neutral powers, and the usage and customs of civilized nations; and on no pretense whatever, presume to take or seize any ships or vessels belonging to the subjects of princes or powers in alliance with these United States; except they are employed in carrying contraband goods or soldiers to our enemies; and in such case you are to conform to the stipulations contained in the treaties subsisting between such princes or powers and these states; and you are not to capture, seize, or plunder any ships or vessels of our enemies, being under the protection of neutral coasts, nations, or princes, under the pains and penalties expressed in a proclamation issued by the Congress of the United States, the ninth day of May, in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and seventy-eight.

Third. You shall permit all neutral vessels 118*] freely to navigate *on the high seas, or coasts of America, except such as are employed in carrying contraband goods or soldiers to the enemies of these United States.

Fourth. You shall not seize or capture any effects belonging to the subjects of the belligerent powers on board neutral vessels, excepting contraband goods; and you are carefully to observe, that the term contraband, is confined to those articles which are expressly declared to be such in the treaty of amity and commerce, of the sixth day of February, one thousand seven hundred and seventy-eight, between these United States and his most Christian Majesty, namely, arms, great guns, bombs, with their fuses, and other things belonging to them, cannon-balls, gunpowder, matches, pikes, swords, lances, spears, halberts, mortars, petards, grenadoes, saltpetre, muskets, musket-balls, bucklers, helmets, breastplates, coats of mail, and the like kind of arms proper for arming soldiers, musket-rests, belts, horses, with their furniture, and all other warlike instruments whatever.

Fifth. You shall bring all such ships and vessels as you shall seize or capture, with their guns, rigging, tackle, apparel, and furniture, and ladings, to judgment, in any of the courts of admiralty that now are, or hereafter may be, established in any of these United States, in any court authorized by his most Christian Majesty, or any other power in alliance with these United States, to take cognizance of captures and seizures made by the private armed vessels of these states, and to judicially hear and determine thereon.

Sixth. You shall send the master or pilot, and one or more principal person of the company, of every ship or vessel by you taken, in such ship or vessel, as soon after the capture as may be, to be by the judge or judges of such court as aforesaid, examined upon oath, and make answer to such interrogatories as may be pronounced, touching the interest or property of the ship or vessel and her lading; and at the same time you shall deliver, or cause to be delivered, to the judge or judges, all passes, sea-briefs, charter-parties, bills of lading, cockets, letters, and other documents and writings found on board, proving *the said papers by [*119 the affidavit of yourself, of some other person present at the capture, to be produced as they were received, without fraud, addition, subtraction, or embezzlement.

Seventh. You shall keep and preserve every ship or vessel, and cargo by you taken, until they shall, by sentence of a court properly authorized, be adjudged lawful prize, or acquitted; not selling, spoiling, wasting or diminishing the same, or breaking the bulk thereof, nor suffering any such thing to be done.

Eighth. If any of your officers or crew shall, in cold blood, kill or maim, or by torture, or otherwise, cruelly, inhumanly, and contrary to common usage, and the practice of civilized nations in war, treat any person or persons surprised in the ship or vessel you shall take, the offender shall be severely punished.

Ninth. You shall, by all convenient opportunities, send to the board of admiralty, or secretary of marine, written accounts of the captures you shall make, with the numbers and names of the captives, and intelligence of what may occur, or be discovered, concerning the designs of the enemy, and the destinations, motions, and operations of their fleets and armies.

Tenth. One-third at least of your whole company shall be landsmen.

Eleventh. You shall not ransom or discharge any prisoners or captives, but you are to take the utmost care to bring them into port; and if, from necessity, you shall be obliged to dismiss any prisoners at sea, you shall, on your return from your cruise, make report thereof, on oath, to the judge of the admiralty of the state to which you belong, or in which you arrive, within twenty days after your arrival, with your reasons for such dismissal; and you are to deliver at your expense, or at the expense of your owners, the prisoners you shall bring into port, to a commissary of prisoners nearest the place of their landing, or into the nearest county jail.

Twelfth. You shall observe all such further instructions as *shall hereafter be given [*120 by the United States in Congress assembled, when you shall have notice thereof.

1.—This ordinance was passed by Congress in consequence of the temporary recognition, by the United States and France, of the principles of the armed neutrality, as laid down in the declaration of Her Majesty, the Empress of Russia, of February 26th, 1780. 2 Dall. 18. See, also, Darby, et al. v. The Brig Estern, 1b. 34.

Thirteenth. If you shall do anything contrary to these instructions, or to others hereafter to be given, or willingly suffer such thing to be done, you shall not only forfeit your commission, and be liable to an action for breach of the condition of your bond, but be responsible to the party grieved, for damages sustained by such malversation.

Ordered, that the Board of Admiralty report, as soon as may be, proper regulations for the conducting and governing the vessels of war of the United States, and other armed vessels.

In pursuance of the powers delegated by the confederation in cases of capture on water:

Be it ordained, by the United States in Congress assembled, that from and after the first day of February next, all resolutions and ordinances of Congress relating to captures or recaptures on water, and coming within the purview of this ordinance, except as is hereinafter excepted, shall be null and void; but questions of this nature arising before, or which shall be undetermined at that day, shall be determined at any time during the war with Great Britain, according to them, in the same manner as if this ordinance had never been made.

It shall be lawful to capture, and to obtain condemnation of the property hereinafter enumerated, if found below high water-mark; that is to say,

All ships and other vessels, of whatsoever size or denomination, belonging to an enemy of the United States, with their rigging, tackle, apparel, and furniture.

All goods, wares, and merchandises belonging to an enemy, and found on board of a ship or other vessel of such enemy.

All contraband goods, wares, and merchandises, to whatever nation belonging, although found in a neutral bottom, if destined for the use of an enemy; but the goods, wares and 121 merchandises *belonging to an enemy, contraband goods, and goods destined to a blockaded, invested, or besieged port, being always excepted, found in a vessel belonging to a foreign nation, other than an enemy, shall, in no case, be subject to condemnation.

Provided, nevertheless, that from and after the first day of March, in the year one thousand seven hundred and eighty-two, all goods, wares, and merchandises, of the growth, produce, or manufacture of Great Britain, or of any territory depending thereon, if found within three leagues of the coasts, and destined to any port or place of the United States, in any ship or vessel belonging to the citizens of the said states, or the subjects of any neutral power, shall be liable to capture and condemnation, unless the same shall have been previously captured from the enemy and condemned, or in consequence of capture, may be proceeding to some port or place not in the power of the said enemy, for trial and condemnation.

All ships or other vessels, goods, wares, and merchandises, belonging to any power, or the subjects of any power against which letters of marque or reprisal shall have issued.

All ships or other vessels, with their rigging, tackle, apparel, and furniture, and with their cargoes, to whatsoever nation belonging, destined to any port or place, invested, besieged, or blockaded, by a sufficient force belonging to, in the service of, or co-operating with the United States, so effectually as that one cannot attempt to enter into such port or place without evident danger.

All ships or other vessels, with their rigging, tackle, apparel, and furniture, and with their cargoes, found in the possession of pirates.

The goods, wares, and merchandises, to be adjudged contraband, are the following, that is to say: Cannons, mortars, fire-arms, pistols, bombs, grenades, bullets, balls, fuses, flints, matches, powder, saltpetre, sulphur, carcasses, pikes, swords, belts, pouches, cartouch-boxes, saddles and bridles, in any quantity beyond what may be necessary for the ship's provision, and may properly appertain to, and be adjudged necessary *for, every man of the [*122 ship's crew, or for each passenger. If it shall manifestly appear, that of any entire thing of which division cannot be made without injury to its value, a subject of the enemy, and a citizen or a subject of a foreign power, not being an enemy, are joint holders, the whole shall be condemned and sold for gold or silver, the proper proportion of the net proceeds of which shall be deposited in the treasury of the state in which the sale shall be, to be paid to the order of such citizen, or the subject of such foreign power.

If such division can be accomplished, but neither the citizen, nor the subject of a foreign power, nor his agent, shall require specific restitution of his property, there shall be a sale in the same manner as if the property were indivisible. But if, in such case, a requisition be made to this effect, the due proportion shall be specifically restored.

Where property shall have been originally captured on land from a state, or a citizen of the United States, and shall be recaptured below high water-mark by another citizen thereof, restitution shall be made to the former owner, upon the payment of a reasonable salvage, not exceeding one-fourth part of the value; no regard being had to the time of possession by the enemy.

In all cases of recapture by an armed vessel, fitted out at the expense of the United States, of a vessel, or other effects, belonging to a citizen, the court shall adjudge the proportion which would be due to the United States, to be remitted to such citizen, no regard being had to the time of possession by the enemy.

On the recapture by a citizen, of any negro, mulatto, Indian, or other person, from whom labor or service is lawfully claimed by a state, or a citizen of a state, specific restitution shall be adjudged to the claimant, whether the original capture shall have been made on land or water, and without regard to the time of possession by the enemy, a reasonable salvage being paid by the claimant to the recaptor, not exceeding one-fourth of the value of such labor or service, to be estimated *according [*123 to the laws of the state under which the claim shall be made.

But if the service of such negro, mulatto, Indian, or other person captured below high water-mark, shall not be legally claimed within a year and a day from the sentence of the court, he shall be set at liberty.

In all other cases of recapture, restitution shall be made to the owner, upon payment of one-third part of the true value for salvage, if the property shall have been retaken in less than twenty-four hours after the capture. But if it shall not have been retaken until the expiration of twenty-four hours after the capture, restitution shall not be made of any part.

Besides those who are duly authorized to make captures by special commission, captures of the property of an enemy shall be adjudged lawful when made:

1st. By a private vessel not having such commission, satisfactory proof being produced that they were made in pursuing the course of her voyage, and repelling a previous attack from an enemy.

2d. By any body or detachment of regular soldiers.

3d. By inhabitants of the country, if made within cannonshot of the shore.

4th. By an armed vessel sailing under a commission of his most Christian Majesty.

5th. By the crews of British vessels, while captures of this sort are licensed by the British.

Recaptures shall be made by no other persons than those authorized to make captures, except the crews of vessels retaken.

The destruction of papers, or the possession of double papers by any captured vessel, shall be considered as evidence for condemnation, unless good cause be shown to the contrary.

From and after the first day of February, which shall be in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and eighty-two, any letters of passport or safe conduct, granted before the 27th of March last, under the authority 124* of Congress, to any *person whatsoever, for removal of property from a place beyond sea within the dominions or possessions of the British king, shall be void.

Upon the capture of a vessel commissioned as a man of war or privateer, by any of the vessels of war of the United States of America, the whole of the property condemned shall be adjudged to the captors, to be divided in the following manner (saving to all persons who shall lose a limb in any engagement, or shall be otherwise disabled in the service of the United States, every benefit accruing to them under the resolutions of Congress of the 28th day of November, one thousand seven hundred and seventy-five), that is to say:

To the commander-in-chief of the navy of the United States, shall be allotted one twentieth part of all prizes taken by an armed vessel or vessels under his orders and command; when there shall be no such commander-in-chief, the one-twentieth part allotted to him shall be paid into the treasury of the United States.

To the captain of any single armed vessel, two-twentieth parts; but if more ships or vessels be in company when a prize is taken, then the two-twentieth parts shall be divided equally among all the captains.

To the captains of marines, lieutenants, and masters, three-twentieth parts of all prizes taken when they are in company, to be divided equally among them.

To the lieutenants of marines, surgeons, chaplains, pursers, boatswains, gunners, carpenters, master's mates, and the secretary of the fleet, two-twentieth parts, and one-half of one-twentieth part, to be divided equally among them.

To the following petty warrant officers, viz.: midshipmen (allowing for each ship six, for each brig four, and for each sloop two), captain's clerks, surgeon's mates, stewards, sail-makers, cooper's, armorers (allowing for each vessel one of each only), boatswain's mates, gunner's mates, carpenter's mates (allowing for each vessel two of each), cooks, cockswains (allowing for each vessel one of each), serjeants of marines (allowing two for each ship, and one for each brig and *sloop), three- [*125 twentieth parts, to be divided equally among them; and when a prize is taken by any vessel, on board, or in company of which the commander-in-chief is, then the commander-in-chief's cook, or cockswain, shall be added to the petty warrant officers, and share equally with them.

The remaining eight-twentieth parts, and half of the one-twentieth part, shall be divided among the rest of the vessels' company or companies, as it may happen, share and share alike.

No officer nor man shall have any share but such as are actually on board their several vessels when any prize or prizes shall be taken, excepting only such as may have been ordered on board any other prizes, before taken, or sent away by his or their commanding officers.

Upon the capture of any vessel, if made by a vessel of war belonging to the United States, one-half of the property condemned shall be decreed to the United States, and the other half to the captors, to be divided as aforesaid; if by a private vessel not having a commission, the whole shall be decreed to the captors; if by any body, or detachment of regular or other troops in the service of the United States, the whole shall be adjudged to the captors, to be divided in proportion to the pay in the line of the army; if by inhabitants of the country, being in arms, the whole shall be adjudged to the captors, to be divided equally among them; provided, that if any such inhabitant shall be wounded in making the capture, he shall be entitled to two shares, and if killed, his legal representatives shall be entitled to four shares; if by the crews of British vessels, the whole shall be adjudged to the captors, to be divided at the discretion of the court.

On recapture by an armed vessel belonging to the United States, of a vessel under the protection of a vessel belonging to the enemy, commissioned as a man-of-war or privateer, or where the vessel retaken is equipped in a warlike manner, the proportion to be withdrawn from the original owner shall be divided, as in the case of a capture of an enemy's vessel commissioned as a man-of-war or privateer.

*On recapture, by an armed vessel [*126 belonging to the United States, of a vessel under the protection of a hostile vessel not commissioned as a man-of-war or privateer; and where the vessel retaken is not equipped in a warlike manner, the proportion to be withdrawn from the original owner shall be divided, as in the case of a hostile vessel not commissioned as a man-of-war or privateer.

The rules of decision in the several courts shall be the resolutions and ordinances of the United States in Congress assembled, public treaties, when declared to be so by an act of Congress, and the law of nations, according to the general usages of Europe. Public treaties shall have the pre-eminence in all trials.

This ordinance shall commence in force on the first day of February, which will be in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and eighty-two.

Done by the United States in Congress assembled, &c., &c.

Tuesday, January 8th, 1782.

The ordinance for amending the ordinance, ascertaining what captures on water shall be lawful, was read a third time and passed, as follows:

An Ordinance for amending the Ordinance, ascertaining what captures on water shall be lawful.

Whereas, there hath been great variance in the decisions of several maritime courts within the United States, concerning the pretensions of vessels claiming a share of prizes, as being in sight at the time of capture; some having adjudged that the mere circumstance of being in sight was a sufficient foundation of title, while others have required proof of a more active influence; and whereas, this inconvenience hath arisen from the want of an uniform rule of determination in such cases,

Be it therefore ordained, by the United States in Congress assembled, that no share of any 127 prize shall be adjudged to a *vessel being in sight at the time of capture, unless the said vessel shall have been able at the time when the captured vessel struck, to throw a shot as far as the space between herself and the captured vessel; and that every vessel coming in aid of the captors, which shall have been able at the time when the captured vessel struck, to throw a shot as aforesaid, and shall have been duly authorized to make captures, shall be entitled to share according to the number of her men and the weight of her metal; provided, that nothing herein contained shall be construed to affect any agreement which shall have previously been made between vessels cruising in concert.

And be it further ordained by the authority aforesaid, that whensoever an armed vessel belonging to, and commissioned by the enemy, shall be captured by any armed vessel belonging to the United States, and duly authorized to make captures, the net proceeds of the sales of the captured vessel, and of her rigging, tackle, apparel, and furniture, shall be adjudged to the captors; and where a cargo shall be on board of such captured vessel, one moiety of the net proceeds of such cargo shall be adjudged to the United States, and the other moiety to the captors.

And be it further ordained by the authority aforesaid, that upon the capture of any vessel belonging to the enemy, and laden with masts or spars, by an armed vessel belonging to the United States, and duly authorized to make captures, the net proceeds of the sales of such captured vessel, and her cargo, shall be adjudged to the captors.

This ordinance shall take effect, and be in Wheat. 5.

force, from and after the last day of February next.

Tuesday, February 26th, 1782

The following ordinance being read a third time, was agreed to:

**An Ordinance for further amending [*128 the Ordinance, ascertaining what captures on water shall be lawful.*

Whereas, divers ships or vessels belonging to the citizens of several of these United States, may have sailed on voyages to Europe, before the publication of the ordinance, entitled, "An ordinance ascertaining what captures on water shall be lawful," where they, as well as vessels belonging to the subjects of neutral powers, may have laden and taken on board, in promiscuous cargoes, goods, wares, and merchandises, of the growth, product, or manufacture of Great Britain, or of some of the dominions or territories thereon depending, without any knowledge of the said ordinance, and may not be able to arrive in any of the ports of these states, on or before the first day of March next, whereby the said goods may become liable to capture and condemnation:

For remedy whereof, it is hereby ordained by the United States in Congress assembled, that no ship or other vessel, which shall have sailed from any port or place in Europe, not belonging to the King of Great Britain, on or before the tenth day of April next, for any port or place within the United States, not in possession of the enemy, shall be liable to capture or molestation, merely for having on board goods, wares, or other merchandises, of the growth, product, or manufacture of Great Britain, or of any territory depending thereon.

And it is hereby further ordained, that where vessels, their cargoes, or any part thereof, belonging to any citizen of these United States, sailing, or being within the body of a county, or within any river or arm of the sea, or within cannonshot of the shore of any of these states, and laden with the produce of the country, and destined for a port or place within these states, not in possession of the enemy, shall be captured by the enemy, and shall be recaptured below high water-mark by another citizen thereof, restitution shall be made to the former owner, upon the payment of a reasonable salvage, not exceeding one-fourth *part of the [*129 value, no regard being had to the time of possession of the enemy.

And be it further ordained, that so much of the aforesaid ordinance as comes within the purview of this, be, and hereby is repealed.

Done by the United States in Congress assembled, &c., &c.

An Ordinance for the better distribution of prizes in certain cases.

Be it ordained by the United States in Congress assembled, that so much of the ordinance, entitled, "An ordinance ascertaining what captures on water shall be lawful," as ordains that upon the capture of a vessel commissioned as a man-of-war, or a privateer, by any of the vessels of war of the United States of America, the whole of the property condemned shall be adjudged to the captors, be, and the same is hereby repealed; and that, in all such cases of capture, the whole of the property condemned shall be adjudged to the use of the captors, if the vessel taken shall be of equal or superior force to the vessel making the capture; if otherwise, one-half only shall be adjudged to the captors, and the other half to the use of the United States, and shall, after condemnation, be so appropriated, unless the United States in Congress assembled, in reward of distinguished valor and exertion, shall otherwise specially direct.

And be it further ordained by the authority aforesaid, that the resolution of the 15th day of November, 1776, giving to the commanders, officers, and men of the ships or vessels of war, a bounty for every cannon, and for every man belonging to British ships or vessels of war captured by them, be, and the same is hereby repealed.

BRITISH STATUTES AND PRIZE INSTRUCTIONS.

With regard to the issuing of letters of marque, the Lord High Admiral of Great Britain, or the commissioners appointed for 130* *executing that office, or any three of such commissioners, or any persons by them empowered or appointed, shall, at the request of any duly-qualified owner or owners of any ship or vessel duly registered, according to the directions of the acts passed in the 26th and 34th years of Geo. III.<sup>1</sup> (provided such owner or owners give the bail or security hereafter specified), cause to be issued in the usual manner, one or more commissions, or letters of marque and reprisal, to any person or persons nominated by such owner to be commander, or (in case of death, successively) commanders, of such ship or vessel; for the attacking, surprising, seizing, and taking, by and with such vessel, or with the crew thereof, any place or fortress upon the land, or any ship or vessel, arms, ammunition, stores of war, goods or merchandise, belonging to, or possessed by, any of His Majesty's enemies, in any sea, creek, haven, or river.<sup>2</sup>

All persons applying for such commissions, or letters of marque, must make their application in writing, subscribed with their hands, to the high admiral, or other persons thus empowered, or to the lieutenant or judge of the High Court of Admiralty, or to his surrogate, and such application must be set forth "a particular, true, and exact description of the ship or vessel for which such commission, or letter of marque and reprisal, is requested, specifying the name and burthen of such ship or vessel, what sort of built she is, and the number and nature of the guns, and what other warlike furniture and ammunition are on board the same, to what place the ship belongs, and the name or names of the principal owner or owners of such ship or vessel, and the number of men intended to be put on board the same<sup>3</sup> *(all which particulars must be inserted [*131 in every commission, or letters of marque), for what time they are victualled;" and "also the names of the commanders and officers."<sup>4</sup>

Farther, every commander of a private ship or vessel of war, for which such commission or letters of marque shall be granted, must produce the same to the collector, customer, or searcher, for the time being, of His Majesty's customs, residing at, or belonging to the port, whence such ship shall be first fitted out, or to their lawful deputies. And such collector, customer, &c., shall, without fee or reward, and as early as may be, inspect and examine the said vessel, in order to ascertain her built and burthen, the number of men, together with the number and nature of the guns on board. If, after examination, such vessel appear to be of such built and burthen, and to be manned and armed according to the tenor of the description inserted in the commission or letter of marque; or if she be of greater force or burthen than is therein specified; in such case, the collector, &c., or his or their deputies, shall, immediately, upon the request of the commander of such ship or vessel, give him, gratis, a certificate thereof in writing, under his or their hand or hands; and such certificate shall be deemed a necessary clearance before the vessel or letter of marque, thus commissioned, shall be permitted to sail from that port.<sup>5</sup> The same statute likewise declares, that in case any commander proceed out of port upon a cruise, without such certificate of clearance, or with a force inferior to that specified in the commission or letter of marque, the latter shall be absolutely null and void; the commander thus offending shall be subject to the penalty of £1,000 recoverable with full costs of suit by any person, and shall also be *imprisoned for such space of time [*132 as the court shall direct, not exceeding one year for any one offense.<sup>6</sup>

Previously, however, to obtaining letters of marque, bail must be given with surties, before the lieutenant and judge of the High Court of Admiralty, or his surrogate, in the sum of three thousand pounds sterling, if the ship carry more than one hundred and fifty men; and if she carry a less number, in the sum of fifteen

3.—By the 13 Geo. II., c. 3, privateers (and also trading vessels) are allowed to man their ships with foreign seamen, provided they do not exceed three-fourths of the ship's company. This statute also confers all the privileges of British subjects upon such seamen after two years service during war; excepting that no one can be a member of the privy council, or of parliament, hold any office or place of trust, or have any grant of land, tenements, or hereditaments from the crown, either to himself, or any person or persons in trust for him. The duration of this act is unlimited; though several temporary statutes (28 Geo. II., c. 16; 19 Geo. III., c. 14; 33 Geo. III., c. 26) have subsequently allowed the same privileges during war. A late statute, however, requires three years' service.

Previously to taking out letters of marque, the owners of all the vessels, for which such letters shall be granted, must nominate and register in the court a proctor, exercent in the Court of Appeal, in case any appeal should be instituted from the decisions of the court below. 41 Geo. III., c. 96, s. 10.

hundred pounds sterling.<sup>1</sup> Farther, such sureties must, prior to their being bound, severally make oath before the judge of the said Court of Admiralty of England, or judge of any other court of admiralty in any other of His Majesty's dominions, or his or their surrogates, that they are respectively worth more than the sum for which they are to be bound, over and above all their just debts. And in order to prevent frauds, the marshal of the Admiralty Court is enjoined to make diligent inquiry into the sufficiency of such bail and security; and to make his report accordingly to the judge or his surrogate, before any commission or letter of marque can be granted.<sup>2</sup>

No judge of any vice-admiralty court, established in the West Indian or American colonies, can, either directly or indirectly, have any share or interest whatever, in any privateer or letter of marque.<sup>3</sup> Nor can any judge, advocate, marshal, proctor, or any other officer of any admiralty or vice-admiralty court, either in England, or in the colonies, possess any such interest, on pain of forfeiting his employment, and also the sum of five hundred pounds to the use of His Majesty; being convicted of every such offense in any court of record in Great Britain, or at any general session of the peace in any of the American colonies. And all advocates or proctors, thus offending, are forever disqualified and incapacitated from practicing their profession.

Letters of marque are revocable, either by 133*) violating the *revenue laws, or by the Lord High Admiral. In the former case, if the owner or owners, commander, master, or other persons having the command of the letter of marque, or privateer, be guilty of any offense contrary to any acts now in force, or which may hereafter be enacted, for the protection of the customs or excise, or for the prevention of smuggling, such persons shall forfeit their commission, independently of the other penalties or forfeitures incurred by reason of such offense.<sup>4</sup>

Where, however, the Lord High Admiral, or any three or more of the commissioners for executing that office, may deem it expedient to revoke any letters of marque, by any order or orders in writing, under his or their hand or hands, the secretary of the admiralty is required to transmit, as early as possible after such revocation, a notice in writing to the owner or owners of the vessel named or described in such order, or to his or their agent or agents, surety or sureties, or some or one of them. In case the ship be in the Channel, the order of revocation shall be effectual to supersede and annul the commission or letter of marque, at the expiration of twenty days after such notice has been given, or sooner if the notice be actually given in writing by the secretary of the admiralty to the captain or commander of such vessel. If she be in the North Seas, the commission becomes void at the end of thirty days. Six weeks are allowed before the order takes effect, in case the ship be to the south of

Cape Finisterre, or in the Mediterranean; three months, if she be in North America or the West Indies; and if in the East Indies, six months, after such notice is given. Complaint of such revocation may be made to His Majesty in council by any commander, owner, agent, or surety, within thirty days after notice of revocation has been given by the secretary of the admiralty. His Majesty's determination in council, respecting such complaint, is final; but in case the order of revocation be superseded, the commission or letter of marque shall be deemed to have continued in force; and all prizes taken by virtue thereof shall belong to the owners and *captors, in the same [*134 manner as if no such order of revocation had been made. But no person is liable (before he shall have received personal notice of such order) to be punished for doing any lawful matter or thing, which he might have done under the authority of his commission or letter of marque, in case such order of revocation had not been made.<sup>5</sup>

If any person or persons counterfeit, erase, alter, or falsify any commission for war, or letter of marque, or any warrant for making out the same, or any certificate required by law to be obtained, or shall publish or make use of any such commission, warrant, or certificate, knowing the same to be counterfeited, erased, altered, or falsified, such person or persons incur a forfeiture of five hundred pounds, recoverable with full costs of suit, in any court of record in Great Britain.<sup>6</sup> And if any of these offenses be committed out of this realm, they may be alleged to be committed, and may be laid, inquired of, tried, and determined in any county in England, in the same manner, to all intents and purposes, as if such offenses had been done or committed within the body of such county.<sup>7</sup>

No commander of any ship or vessel, having letters of marque, is allowed, at his peril, to wear any jack, pennant, or other ensign or colors, usually borne by king's ships; but, beside the colors in general hoisted by merchant's ships, he must wear a red jack, with the union jack described in the caution, at the upper corner thereof, near the staff.<sup>8</sup>

The commanders of privateers, or merchant ships, having letters of marque and reprisals, are authorized to set upon by force of arms, subdue, and take, the men-of-war, ships, and vessels, goods, wares, and merchandises, belonging to the enemy, or to any subjects of, or persons inhabiting within his territories;<sup>9</sup> but in such a manner, that no hostilities be committed, nor prize attacked, seized, or taken, within the harbors *of princes and [*135 states in amity with us, or in their rivers or roads within shot of their cannon, unless by permission of such princes or states, or of their commanders or governors-in-chief in such places.

If any ship or vessel be taken as prize, none of the officers, mariners, or other persons on board her, shall be stripped of their clothes, or in any sort pillaged, beaten, or evil-intreated, on pain of the offender's being liable to such punishment as a court-martial shall think proper to inflict.<sup>1</sup>

No commanders of privateers, or letters of marque, are allowed to ransom or agree to ransom, quit or set at liberty, any ship or vessel, or their 'cargoes, which shall be seized and taken, on pain of forfeiting their commission, unless in cases of extreme necessity, to be allowed by the Court of Admiralty, and incurring such penalties of fine and imprisonment, as the court shall adjudge.<sup>2</sup> Nor are they permitted, on any pretense whatever, to ransom any prisoner; but they must transmit an account of, and deliver over, such prisoners as they may take on board of any prizes, to the commissioners appointed for exchanging prisoners of war, or to the persons appointed in seaport towns to take charge of prisoners; and such prisoners are subject only to the orders, regulations, and directions of the said commissioners.<sup>3</sup> Farther, it is unlawful for any of His Majesty's subjects to ransom, or to enter into any contract for ransoming any ship belonging to British subjects, or any goods on board the same, which shall be captured by the subjects of any state at war with His Majesty, or by any persons committing hostilities against his subjects.<sup>4</sup> And if any contracts be entered into, or any bills, notes, or other securities be given for that purpose, they are absolutely null and void; beside which, the party thus offending incurs a forfeiture of £500, which may be sued 136*] for by any person.<sup>5</sup> *If any ship or vessel, or any goods or merchandises, be taken or retaken and restored, by any privateer, through consent or clandestinely, or by collusion or connivance, without being brought to adjudication, such ship or vessel, together with the goods and merchandises, and also the ship's tackle, apparel, furniture, arms, and ammunition, shall, on proof thereof, to be made in any court of admiralty, be declared and adjudged a good prize to His Majesty. One moiety of the prize is to go to His Majesty's use, and the other moiety to the person who may sue for the same; beside which, the bond given by the captain of such privateer is forfeited to His Majesty. Further, if such collusive capture, or recapture and restoration, be made by any captain or commander of any king's ships, the vessel thus taken, or retaken and restored, is not only to be condemned as a prize to His Majesty, but also the offenders are disqualified and incapacitated from serving him for seven years, and incur a forfeiture of £1,000, recoverable by any person who may sue for the same; and who is entitled to one-half of the penalty, while the other moiety goes to the use of His Majesty.<sup>6</sup>

All prizes must be conducted either into an English port, or into some other port of the British dominions, as may be most convenient, in order that they may be legally adjudged in the High Court of Admiralty in England, or before the judges of any other admiralty court in the British dominions.<sup>7</sup> All the effects found on board, of whatever description must be preserved, without any part of them being taken out, spoiled, wasted, embezzled, or diminished, and without breaking bulk (unless it shall be necessary for the better securing thereof, or for the necessary use and service of any of His Majesty's ships of war), until judgment has been given in the High Court of Admiralty, or in some other lawfully-authorized court of admiralty, that the ship, goods and merchandises are lawful prize.<sup>8</sup> Persons offending in these respects, not only forfeit *the [137 whole of their respective shares of the captures to the use of the Royal Hospital at Greenwich, but also incur a fine treble the value of the article or articles so embezzled, one-third part of which goes to the same noble institution, and the remainder to any person that may sue for the same;<sup>9</sup> and if the offender be on board one of His Majesty's ships of war, he is liable to suffer such further punishment as a court-martial or the Court of Admiralty shall impose.<sup>10</sup>

In order to prevent any of these abuses, the commissioners for taking examinations in prize causes are, by their regulations, required first to make an entry of the time of the captured vessel's arrival in port; after which they must give directions to the collector of the customs or naval officer at such port, or any other proper person, to see that the prize be duly and safely moored in sufficient depth of water, or on soft ground, so that the ship may receive no damage. The person attending to this business, receives the sum of one guinea from the captor, who must also pay all lights and port charges incurred on account of the prize.<sup>11</sup> Two of these commissioners, accompanied by the collector of the customs or naval officer of the port, then proceed on board the ship, to examine whether bulk has been broken, in which case they are enjoined to certify the same to the judge of the High Court of Admiralty; next, they seal the hatches and chests of merchandise, which are on no account to be opened or unloaded by any persons whomsoever, unless by special order under seal of the court, excepting only in cases of fire and tempest, and of absolute necessity.<sup>12</sup>

11.—"Regulations for the Observance of Prize Commissioners," in Sir James Marriott's "Formulare Instrumentorum," p. 380, &c., Art. 1 and 2.

12.—"Regulations," &c., Art. 3. By an order of the Court of Admiralty, dated January 6, 1782, only two commissioners are allowed to be employed for taking the examinations for one ship with one actuary, and so on by rotation. And with regard to interpreters, in cases of neutral vessels, if the master of the captured neutral ship object that the interpreter does not understand the language, in such case the proper persons are directed to be sent up to London, in order that they may be examined by the officer in Doctors' Commons, at the request of the master. Marriott's "Formulare," pp. 15, 16.

138*] *After the captor has conducted his prize into port, he or one of the chief officers, or some other person present at the capture, must bring or send as early as possible, three or four of the principal of the company (of whom the master and mate or supercargo, must always be two) of every such prize, before the judge of the High Court of Admiralty, or his surrogate, or before the judge of any other lawfully-authorized admiralty court within the British dominions, or such persons as shall be legally commissioned in that behalf, in order that they may be sworn and examined upon such interrogatories<sup>1</sup> as shall tend to the discovery of the truth, concerning the interest or property of such ship or ships, vessel or vessels, and of the goods, merchandises, or other effects found therein. Farther, the captor is obliged, at the time he produces the company to be examined,<sup>2</sup> and before any monition shall be issued, to bring and deliver into the hands of the said judge of the High Court of Admiralty of England, his surrogates, or the judge of such other admiralty court, lawfully authorized within the 139*] British dominions, *or other persons for that purpose commissioned, all such papers, passes, sea briefs, charter-parties, bills of lading, cockets, letters, and other documents and writings, as shall be delivered up or found on board any ship. The captor, chief officer, or some other person who was present at the taking of the prize, and saw such papers and writings delivered up, or found on board at the time of capture, must also make oath that they are brought and delivered in, as they were received and taken, without any fraud, addition, subtraction,<sup>3</sup> or embezzlement, or otherwise to account for the same, upon oath, to the satisfaction of the court.<sup>4</sup>

On receipt of such books, papers, and writings, the commissioners must transmit the same without delay, and under seal (together with copies of the examinations), to the office of the registry of the court of admiralty, wherein such ship may be proceeded against in order to condemnation; but only such books, papers, and writings, shall be made use of and translated, as shall be agreed or insisted upon by the proctors of the several parties, captors or claimants, or (in case no claim be presented by the captor, or his proctor, agent, or register) as shall be necessary for ascertaining the property of such ship or vessel, and her cargo.<sup>5</sup>

If any ship, vessel, or boat, or any goods therein, which may have been taken as prize, shall appear and be proved, in any court of admiralty, to have belonged to any of His Majesty's subjects, of Great Britain or Ireland, or of any other of His Majesty's dominions; and which ships, vessels, or boats were before taken or surprised by any of His Majesty's enemies, and afterwards again surprised and retaken by any ship of war, *privateer, or other ship, [*140 vessel, or boat, under His Majesty's protection or obedience; in such case the recaptured ships or boats, and goods, and every part thereof, formerly belonging to His Majesty's subjects, shall by a decree of the said Court of Admiralty, be restored to the former owners or proprietors, who shall pay the following rates in lieu of salvage, viz.: If the recapture be effected by any of His Majesty's ships, one-eighth part of the ships, vessels, boats, and goods, respectively, to be restored, shall be paid to the flag-officers, captains, officers, seamen, marines, and soldiers on board such ships of war; and such salvage is to be divided among them in the manner and proportion for that purpose directed. But if such recapture be made by any privateer, or other ship, vessel, or boat, one-sixth part of the true value of the said ships, vessels, boats, and goods, shall, without any deduction, be paid to, and divided among, the owner or owners, officers and seamen, in such manner and proportion as they shall have mutually agreed upon.<sup>6</sup>

Where, however, a recapture has been made by the joint operation of one or more of His Majesty's ships, and one or more privateer or privateers, the judge of the Admiralty Court shall order the owner or owners of such recaptured vessel or goods to pay such a salvage as under the circumstances of the case shall to him appear reasonable, to the agent of the recaptors, and in such proportion as the court shall adjudge.<sup>7</sup> But if the ship or vessel, thus retaken, shall have been fitted out by the enemy for war, she shall not be restored to the former owners or proprietors; but whether recaptured by a ship belonging to His Majesty, or by a privateer, shall be adjudged a lawful prize for the benefit of the captors.<sup>8</sup>

1.—In the examination of witnesses, only two commissioners and one actuary are (as observed in the preceding note) allowed to attend; and the examination of every witness is required to be commenced, continued, and finished on the same day, and not at different times. "Regulations," &c., art. 8. p. 386. of Sir J. Marriott's "Formulare." For the same purpose the commissioners are permitted to use only the standing interrogatories, unless the court direct special interrogatories to be proposed, though they may explain any of them to a witness, where it is necessary. If, however, witnesses answer, that "they cannot say," it is the duty of the commissioners to admonish them, that, as they have sworn to speak the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, they must answer to the best of their knowledge; or, where they do not know absolutely, that they must in such case answer to the best of their belief, concerning any fact or matter. "Formulare," p. 385.

2.—If the prize-master neglect to produce witnesses before the commissioners, within forty-eight hours after the arrival of the prize, they must admonish him to bring them forward; and if he refuse or delay, or if the witnesses refuse to be examined, being also admonished of the consequence of their contumacy (viz., imprisonment of their persons for contempt, and confiscation of the ship and cargo), in such case the commissioners are at the expiration of forty-eight hours, to certify the same to the judge of the High Court of Admiralty. "Regulations," &c., art. 1.

3.—If, however, any commanders of His Majesty's ships of war, taking a prize, neglect to preserve, or to transmit the "very originals," entirely and without fraud to the Court of Admiralty, or some other court of commissioners, the offender forfeits his share of the capture, and is liable to such farther punishment as the nature of his offense may deserve, and a court-martial impose. 22 Geo. II., c. 33, stat. 2, s. 7, or the seventh article of war.

8.—Ibid.

If a ship be retaken before she has been carried into an enemy's port, it shall be lawful for her, with the recaptors' consent, to prosecute her voyage; nor is it necessary that they should proceed to adjudication till six months, or till the return of the ship to the port whence she 141* sailed. Farther, by the *recaptors' consent, the cargo may be unladen and disposed of before adjudication; and if such vessel does not return directly to the port whence she sailed, or if the recaptors have had no opportunity of proceeding regularly to adjudication within six months, on account of the absence of the vessel, the Court of Admiralty shall, at the instance of the recaptors, decree restitution to the former owners, paying salvage, upon such evidence as shall appear reasonable; the expense of such proceeding not to exceed the sum of fourteen pounds.<sup>1</sup>

The captors of small armed ships and vessels belonging to the enemy, may include in one adjudication any number of such ships having a commission or letter of marque from the enemy; provided they do not exceed six, and are under fifty tons burthen, having been taken within three months before the application to the admiralty for such adjudication.<sup>2</sup>

For the more speedy condemnation of prizes, the judge of the High Court of Admiralty of England, or of any other court of admiralty thereto authorized, or such person as shall by them be commissioned for that purpose, shall within five days after request made, finish the usual preparatory examination of the persons commonly examined in such cases, in order to inquire and prove whether the capture is a lawful prize or not. The proper monition usual in such cases, shall be issued by the proper officer, and be duly executed by the proper persons, within three days after request made for that purpose; and in case no claim of such captured ship, vessel, or goods, be entered and made in the usual form, twenty days' notice 142* being *given after such monition, or if such claim be put in, and the claimant or claimants shall not, within five days after, give bond in the sum of sixty pounds sterling, to pay costs to the captor or captors, in case the ship, vessel, or goods, shall be adjudged lawful prize, the judge of such admiralty court shall then, on production of the examinations, together with all papers and writings found on board the prize, or upon oath that no such papers or writings were found, proceed to discharge or acquit such capture, or to condemn the same, as shall appear expedient to him, on perusal of the said preparatory examinations, papers, and writings. If, however, such claim be duly entered, and proper security be given, and no other examination appear to be requisite, the judge shall in such case proceed, within ten days, if possible, to give sentence respecting such capture. But where, on entering such claim, and the attestation thereupon, or producing the said papers and writings regarding the captured ship, vessel, or goods, and upon the said preparatory examination, it shall appear doubtful to the judge, whether such capture be lawful prize or not, and he shall deem it necessary, for determining such doubt, to have an examination of witnesses on pleadings given in by the parties, and admitted by the judge, the judge shall, in such case, cause the capture to be forthwith appraised by skillful persons, nominated by the parties, and approved and appointed by the court, and who shall be sworn duly to appraise the same according to the best of their skill and knowledge. And for this purpose the judge shall cause the goods found on board to be unladen and (an inventory, if necessary, being previously taken by the marshal or deputy-marshal of the admiralty) order them to be deposited in proper warehouses, with separate locks, of the collector and comptroller of the customs, or (if there be no comptroller or collector) of the naval officer, and of the agents of both captors and claimants, at the charge of the party requesting the same. After such appraisement, and within fourteen days after claim made, the judge shall take good and sufficient security from the claimants to pay the captors the full value thereof, according to such appraisement, in *case the [*143] same shall be adjudged a lawful prize.<sup>3</sup> He is also enjoined to take sufficient security from the captors to pay such costs as the court shall think proper, in case the ship, vessel or goods, shall not be condemned as lawful prize; and after such securities have been duly given, he shall make an interlocutory order for re-

2.—33 Geo. III., c. 66, s. 11; 43 Geo. III., c. 160, s. 9. Order of the Court of Admiralty, April 11, 1780, in Marriott's "Formulare," p. 4, 5. It is necessary here to remark, that the owners of all privateers are obliged to nominate and register a proctor in the court, whence they obtain their commission or letter of marque; that service on him is binding on the commander, owners, and sureties (41 Geo. III., c. 96, s. 10), and that such owners and sureties are liable to decrees immediately after sentence. Ib. s. 12. In case any privateer proceed to adjudication in any other court than that whence the letters of marque have issued, they must pursue the same conduct before the usual monition is granted, and in case of appeal, the service of the process of the Court of Appeal on him will in like manner be effectual.

3.—No claimants are allowed to take cargo on bail, previously to hearing, without the consent of all the parties. 3 Rob. Adm. Rep. 178. But where all the parties interested are liable to sustain loss or damage from the captured cargoes either being perishing, or of a perishable nature, the Court of Admiralty has ordered, that in all cases, by consent of captor and claimant, or upon attestation exhibited on the part of the claimant only, without the captor's consent, the cargo, or the perishing or perishable part thereof, shall be delivered to him, on his specifying the quantity and quality of the cargo, and giving bail to answer the value thereof, if condemned, and also that he will abide the event of the suit. Such bail must be approved by the captor, or otherwise the persons giving the security must swear that they are truly and severally worth the sum for which they give security; but if the parties cannot agree respecting the value of the cargo, a decree of appraisement may issue from the court in order to ascertain the real value. Where, however, no claim is made, the captor may, on exhibiting an affidavit, specifying the quantity and quality of the perishable cargo, have a decree of appraisement and sale of such cargo, and bring the proceeds into court in view of any claim, eventually to abide any future orders. Order of the Court of Admiralty, April 11, 1780, in Sir J. Marriott's "Formulare," pp. 5, 6. Where a commission of appraisement and sale is granted by the judge of the Vice-Admiralty Court, before final sentence, the proceeds of such sale shall not remain in the hands of the captors or their agents, but shall be deposited in the registry of the court till final sentence be pronounced. 41 Geo. 3, c. 96, s. 7.

leasing or delivering the same to such claimant or claimants, or to his or their agents.<sup>1</sup>

In case, however, any claimant or claimants refuse to give the security required, the judge, on sufficient security being given by the captors, that they will pay the full value to the claimants according to the appraisal thereof, if the capture should not be condemned, shall proceed to make an interlocutory order for releasing and delivering the same to such captor or captors, or to their agents.<sup>2</sup> But as great 144* injury is often *sustained by the sale of captured property in remote parts of the British dominions, the colonial vice-admiralty courts are empowered, where farther proof is ordered, and the claimants of the property decline to take it on bail, to direct such property to be sent to England (with the captors' and claimants' consent), there to be sold by consignees nominated by both parties, and the proceeds of sale to be forthwith deposited in the Bank of England, in the name of such consignees, subject to the final adjudication, expenses of freight, insurance, and other charges, attending the sale and transportation of the property. If, however, it shall appear to the court that the captors unreasonably withhold their consent, they shall (in case of restitution) pay the difference in value of the property, at the time of such restitution, and of the produce thereof, in case such property had been sent for sale to England; the said difference to be ascertained in such manner as shall appear satisfactory to the court for that purpose.

Thus far the regulations relate equally to ships of war and to privateers; but in all proceedings had upon captures made by any privateer in the vice-admiralty courts in the West Indies or America, the owners are to be deemed and considered as parties to every part of such proceedings; and such owners as well as the sureties, are jointly and severally liable to all orders and decrees made therein immediately after final sentence, without any farther personal service on the commander, or putting him in contempt by process of contumacy.

In case, however, any captors or claimants shall not rest satisfied with the sentence, or interlocutory decree having the force of a definitive sentence, pronounced in the High Court of Admiralty of England, or in any colonial vice-admiralty court, the parties aggrieved may appeal to the commissioners appointed for determining appeals in prize causes, in like manner as such appeals have usually been interposed;<sup>3</sup> provided the appellants give sufficient security that they will effectually prosecute 145* such appeal, answer the condemnation, and pay all costs, if the sentence of the respective courts be affirmed. But the execution of such sentence is not to be suspended by the appeal (excepting in the cases hereafter mentioned), if the parties appellate give sufficient security, to be approved of by the court where such sentence was given, that they will restore the property in litigation, or the value thereof, to the appellants, in case the sentence or the interlocutory decree appealed from, shall be reversed.<sup>4</sup> And in cases of appeal from a colonial vice-admiralty court, the property in litigation may, at the appellant's request, be sent by the court to England for sale, and the proceeds be deposited in the bank, in the manner already specified;<sup>5</sup> or if the property shall have been converted by sale, the proceeds thence arising shall be consigned to England and deposited in a similar manner. Should any question or difficulty arise respecting any property or proceeds thus sent to England, either before or after any such appeal, at any time after their arrival in England, or respecting the sale or proceeds thereof, the captors or claimants may, on giving notice to the adverse parties, apply by their proctors to the High Court of Admiralty (if before the prosecution of the appeal), or (afterwards) lords commissioners of appeal, for their directions concerning the sale or management of such property or proceeds.<sup>6</sup>

If any person, not being a party in the first instance, appeal from a definitive sentence, or interlocutory decree having the force of such sentence, such person, or his or her agent or agents, must at the same time enter his, her, or their claim or claims, as their appeal will otherwise be null and void.<sup>7</sup>

In all prize causes, whether tried in the English admiralty, or in a colonial vice-admiralty court, all persons interested, whether they be or be not parties in the first instance, may take out an inhibition, and prosecute an appeal within twelve calendar *months, to be [*146 computed from the day of the date of the sentence, or decree appealed from. But if no inhibition be taken out before the twelve months elapse, no appeal will be allowed to be prosecuted, nor will any inhibition be granted, but the said sentence, or interlocutory decree, is to stand confirmed as to such person.<sup>8</sup>

In certain special prize causes, however, to be mentioned in His Majesty's order or orders in council, His Majesty may authorize the persons interested (whether parties or not in the first instance, and in whatever court the decree or sentence appealed from may have been pronounced) to take out inhibitions for prosecuting appeals after the expiration of twelve months; and the lords commissioners of appeals may, if distribution has not taken place, permit an appeal to be prosecuted after that period has elapsed, where, on special cause shown, they shall deem it reasonable to grant such permission;<sup>9</sup> but if it shall appear to the satisfaction of the lords commissions of appeals in prize causes, that distribution has been made of the proceeds of the prizes, at or after the time or times when the right of appealing would have been barred, if no such order had been made, and before notice of such order duly given to the captors, the said captors are not liable to make compensation to the claimants, provided they duly comply with the following regulation,<sup>1</sup> viz.: Where His Majesty shall authorize such appeals, the captors shall, within a reasonable time, at the requisition of the claimants, deliver a true copy of the account of sales, and of all proceedings had under the authority of the sentence or decree, pronounced in the court below, to His Majesty's Procurator-General, who is authorized and required to defend all such appeals, and in such manner as His Majesty's Advocate-General shall direct. But if the captors shall neglect to comply with these regulations, or to obey such further orders as the lords commissioners may deem necessary, they forfeit all claim to any benefit or discharge under the act above detailed, and are 147* liable to be proceeded against in the same manner as if the appeal had been duly entered within the period of twelve months, allowed for appeals from the decisions of the courts below.<sup>2</sup>

In cases of appeal, interposed in the manner already specified, the judge of the Court of Admiralty may, at the request and expense either of the captors or claimants (or of the claimant only, where the privilege is reserved in favor of the claimant by any treaty or treaties subsisting between His Majesty and foreign powers), order such capture to be appraised (unless the parties shall otherwise agree upon the value thereof), and direct an inventory to be made. Next, the judge is required to take security for the full value thereof, and he may order the capture to be delivered to the party giving such security, notwithstanding such appeal; but if any difficulty shall arise, or there be any sufficient objection to the giving or taking of security, the judge shall, at the request of either of the parties, order the captured goods and effects to be entered, landed, and sold by auction, under the care of the proper officers of the customs, and under the inspection of persons to be appointed by the claimants and captors. The money, arising by such sale, shall be brought into court, and by the register, or his deputy or deputies, be deposited in the Bank of England; or if the captors and claimants agree, such money may be vested in some public securities at interest, in the names of the register, and of such trustees as the captors and claimants shall appoint, and the court shall approve. And if such security be given by the claimants, the judge shall give the captured vessel a pass under his seal, to prevent her from being again taken by His Majesty's subjects in her destined voyage.<sup>3</sup>

Where the sentence, or interlocutory decree, having the force of a definitive sentence, shall be finally reversed, after the sale of any ship or goods, the net proceeds of such sale (after payment of all expenses attending the same) shall be deemed to be the full value of such *148 ship and goods; nor shall the parties appellate, and their securities, be answerable for the value beyond the amount of such net proceeds, unless such sale appear to have been made fraudulently, or without due care.<sup>4</sup>

With regard to the practice of the Court of Appeals, as many inconveniences formerly arose from delays in serving the processes of that court, it is now provided, that in all cases of captures by His Majesty's ships, a service upon His Majesty's proctor shall be deemed an effectual service upon the commander of the ship making such capture. Farther, on taking out letters of marque, the owners of all the ships or vessels, for which such letters shall be granted, must nominate and register in the court granting such letter of marque, a proctor, exercent in the Court of Appeal in prize causes, with power of revocation and substitution; and service of process on such proctor shall be deemed effectual service upon the commander, owners, and sureties of privateers, in all cases where an appeal has been declared in the court below, within fourteen days after sentence. But neither His Majesty's proctor, nor any nominated proctor, is answerable for any damages arising to their parents respectively, from non-appearance in their behalf in the Court of Appeal, unless such proctor shall have accepted the said nomination by a writing under his hand; and, also, unless the said parties shall have sufficiently instructed him to appear and defend the appeal.<sup>5</sup> Where, however, no appeal has been entered in the manner, and within the time above specified, it shall be deemed sufficient service upon the parties, if the process be served either upon the commander of the king's ship, or upon his registered agent in this kingdom, or upon His Majesty's law-officer in the court below; or in cases of captures by privateers, if such process be served upon the commander of the privateer, or upon any or either of the sureties to the letters of marque.<sup>6</sup>

[TRANSLATION.]

GENERAL DON FRANCISCO DIONISIO VIVES TO THE SECRETARY OF STATE.

SIR:—In conformity with the orders of my government, which were communicated to Mr. 152*] Forsyth on the 16th of December *last, by his Excellency the Duke of San Fernando and Quiroga, and with the earnest desire of the king, my master, to see a speedy adjustment of the existing difficulties which obstruct the establishment, on a permanent basis, of the good understanding so obviously required by the interests of both powers, I have the honor to address you, and frankly to state to you, that my august sovereign, after a mature and deliberate examination, in full council, of the treaty of 22d February, of the last year, saw, with great regret, that, in its tenor, it was very far from embracing all the measures indispensably requisite to that degree of stability which, from his sense of justice, he was anxious to see established in the settlement of the existing differences between the two nations.

The system of hostility which appears to be pursued in so many parts of the Union against the Spanish dominions, as well as against the property of all their inhabitants, is so public and notorious, that, to enter into detail, would only serve to increase the causes of dissatisfaction; I may be allowed, however, to remark, that they have been justly denounced to the public of the United States, even by some of their own fellow-citizens.

Such a state of things, therefore, in which individuals may be considered as being at war, while their governments are at peace with each other, is diametrically opposed to the mutual and sincere friendship, and to the good understanding which it was the object of the treaty (though the attempt has failed) to establish, and of the immense sacrifices consented to by His Majesty to promote.

These alone were motives of sufficient weight imperiously to dictate the propriety of suspending the ratification of the treaty, even although the American envoy had not at first announced, in the name of his government, and subsequently required, of that of Spain, a declaration which tended directly to annul one of its most clear, precise, and conclusive articles, even after the signature and ratification of the treaty.

The king, my master, influenced by considerations so powerful as to carry with them the 153*] fullest evidence, has, therefore, *judged it necessary and indispensable, in the exercise of his duties as a sovereign, to request certain explanations of your government; and he has, in consequence, given me his commands to propose to it the following points; in the discussion and final arrangement of which, it seems proper that the relative state of the two nations should be taken into full consideration.

That the United States, taking into due consideration the scandalous system of piracy established in, and carried on from, several of their ports, will adopt measures satisfactory and effectual, to repress the barbarous excesses, and unexampled depredations, daily committed upon Spain, her possessions, and properties; so as to satisfy what is due to international rights, and is equally claimed by the honor of the American people.

That, in order to put a total stop to any future armaments, and to prevent all aid whatsoever being afforded from any part of the Union, which may be intended to be directed against, and employed in the invasion of, His Catholic Majesty's possessions in North America, the United States will agree to offer a pledge (a dar una següiradad) that their integrity shall be respected.

And, finally, that they will form no relations with the pretended governments of the revolted provinces of Spain situate beyond sea, and will conform to the course of proceeding adopted, in this respect, by other powers in amity with Spain.

Extract of a Letter from General Vives to the Secretary of State, dated April 24th, 1820.

It is evident that the scandalous proceedings of a number of American citizens, the decisions of several of the courts of the Union, and the criminal expedition set on foot within it for the invasion of His Majesty's possessions in North America, at the very period when the ratification was still pending, were diametrically opposite to the most sacred principles of amity, and to the nature and essence of the treaty itself. These hostile proceedings were, notwithstanding, tolerated by the *federal gov- [154] ernment, and thus the evil was daily aggravated; so that the belief generally prevailed throughout Europe, that the ratification of the treaty by Spain, and the acknowledgment of the independence of the rebellious transatlantic colonies by the United States, would be simultaneous acts.

Extract of a Letter from the Secretary of State to General Vives, dated May 3d, 1820.

I am now instructed to repeat the assurance which has already been given you, that the representations which appear to have been made to your government of a system of hostility, in various parts of the Union, against the Spanish dominions, and the property of Spanish subjects; of decisions marked with such hostility by any of the courts of the United States, and of the toleration in any case of it by this government, are unfounded. In the existing unfortunate civil war between Spain and the South American provinces, the United States have constantly avowed, and faithfully maintained, an impartial neutrality. No violation of that neutrality by any citizen of the United States has ever received sanction or countenance from this government. Whenever the laws, previously enacted for the preservation of neutrality, have been found, by experience, in any manner defective, they have been strengthened by new provisions and severe penalties. Spanish property, illegally captured, has been constantly restored by the decisions of the tribunals of the United States, nor has the life itself been spared of individuals guilty of piracy, committed upon Spanish property on the high seas.

Should the treaty be ratified by Spain, and the ratification be accepted by and with the advice and consent of the senate, the boundary line recognized by it will be respected by the United States, and due care will be taken to prevent any transgression of it. No new law or engagement will be necessary for that purpose. The existing laws are adequate to the suppression of such disorders, and they will be, as they have been, faithfully carried into effect. The miserable disorderly movement of 155 *] a number not exceeding seventy lawless individual stragglers, who never assembled within the jurisdiction of the United States, into a territory to which His Catholic Majesty has no acknowledged right, other than the yet unratified treaty, was so far from receiving countenance or support from the government of the United States, that every measure necessary for its suppression was promptly taken under their authority; and from the misrepresentations which have been made of this very insignificant transaction to the Spanish government, there is reason to believe that the pretended expedition itself, as well as the gross exaggerations which have been used to swell its importance, proceed from the same sources, equally unfriendly to the United States and to Spain.

As a necessary consequence of the neutrality between Spain and the South American provinces, the United States can contract no engagement not to form any relations with those provinces. This has explicitly and repeatedly been avowed and made known to your government, both at Madrid and at this place. The demand was resisted, both in conference and written correspondence, between Mr. Erving and Mr. Pizarro.

Mr. Onís had long and constantly been informed, that a persistence in it would put an end to the possible conclusion of any treaty whatever. Your sovereign will perceive, that as such an engagement cannot be contracted by the United States consistently with their obligations of neutrality, it cannot justly be required of them, nor have any of the European nations ever bound themselves to Spain by such an engagement.

Extract of a Letter from General Vives to the Secretary of State, dated May 5th, 1820.

[TRANSLATION.]

SIR:—In answer to your note of the 3d instant, and in pursuance of what I expressed to Wheat. 5.

you in both our late conferences, I have to state to you, that I am satisfied upon the first point of the proposals contained in my note of the 14th ultimo, and am *persuaded, that [*156 if the existing laws enacted for the suppression of piracy, should prove inadequate, more effectual measures will be adopted by your government for the attainment of that important object.

I also admit as satisfactory, the answer given to the second point; but I cannot assent to your assertion that the laws of this country have always been competent to the prevention of the excesses complained of; it being quite notorious that the expedition alluded to has not been the only one set on foot for the invasion of His Majesty's dominions; and it is, therefore, not surprising, that the king, my lord, should give credit to the information received in relation to that expedition, or that he should now require of your government a pledge, that the integrity of the Spanish possessions in North America shall be respected.

I mentioned to you in conference, and I now repeat it, that the answer to the third point was not such as I could, agreeably to the nature of my instructions, accept, as being satisfactory; and that, although His Majesty might not have required of any of the European governments the declaration which he has required of yours, yet that ought not to be considered as unreasonable, it being well known to the king, my master, that those governments, so far from being disposed to wish to recognize the insurgent governments of the Spanish colonies, had declined the invitation, intimated to them some time past, by yours, to acknowledge the pretended republic of Buenos Ayres.

Extract of a Letter from the Secretary of State to General Vives, dated May 8th, 1820.

The assurances which you had given me in the first personal conference between us, of your own entire satisfaction with the explanations given you upon all the points on which you had been instructed to ask them, would naturally have led to the expectation, that the promise which you was authorized to give would at least not be withheld. From your letter of the 5th *instant, however, it [*157 appears that no discretion has been left to you, to pledge even His Majesty's promise of ratification, in the event of your being yourself satisfied with the explanations upon all the points desired; that the only promise you can give is conditional, and the condition a point upon which your government, when they prescribed it, could not but know it was impossible that the United States should comply; a condition incompatible with their independence, their neutrality, their justice, and their honor.

It was also a condition which His Catholic Majesty had not the shadow of a right to prescribe. The treaty had been signed by Mr. Onís with a full knowledge that no such engagement as that contemplated by it would ever be acceded to by the American government, and after long and unwearied efforts to obtain it. The differences between the United States and Spain had no connection with the war between Spain and South America. The object of the treaty was to settle the boundaries, and adjust and provide for the claims between your nation and ours; and Spain at no time could have a right to require that any stipulation concerning the contest between her and her colonies should be connected with it. As His Catholic Majesty could not justly require it, during the negotiation of that treaty, still less could it afford a justification for withholding his promised ratification after it was concluded.

The proposal which, at a prior period, had been made by the government of the United States, to some of the principal powers of Europe, for a recognition, in concert, of the independence of Buenos Ayres, was founded, as I have observed to you, upon an opinion then and still entertained, that this recognition must, and would, at no very remote period, be made by Spain herself; that the joint acknowledgment by several of the principal powers of the world at the same time, might probably induce Spain the sooner to accede to that necessity, in which she must ultimately acquiesce, and would thereby hasten an event propitious to her own interests, by terminating a struggle in which she is wasting her strength and resources, without a possibility of success; an event ardently to be desired by every *friend [*158 of humanity, afflicted by the continual horrors of a war, cruel and sanguinary almost beyond example; an event not only desirable to the unhappy people who are suffering the complicated distresses and calamities of this war, but to all the nations having relations of amity and commerce with them. This proposal, founded upon such motives, far from giving to Spain the right to claim of the United States an engagement not to recognize the South American governments, ought to have been considered by Spain as a proof at once of the moderation and discretion of the United States; as evidence of their disposition to discard all selfish or exclusive views in the adoption of a measure which they deemed wise and just in itself, but most likely to prove efficacious, by a common adoption of it, in a spirit entirely pacific, in concert with other nations, rather than by a precipitate resort to it, on the part of the United States alone.

After the present term, no cause standing for argument will be heard by the court, until the parties shall have furnished the court with a printed brief or abstract of the cause, containing the substance of all the material pleadings, facts, and documents, on which the parties rely, and the points of law and fact intended to be presented at the argument.

RULE XXXI. ## REPORTS OF THE DECISIONS

OF THE

Supreme Court of the United States.

FEBRUARY TERM, 1821.

[*PRIZE.]

THE AMIABLE ISABELLA.

MUNOS, Claimant.

Whether the capture is made by a duly commissioned captor, or not, is a question between the government and the captor, with which the claimant has nothing to do.

If the capture be made by a non-commissioned captor, the government may contest the right of the captor after a decree of condemnation, and before a distribution of the prize proceeds; and the condemnation must be to the government.

The 17th article of the Spanish treaty of 1795, so far as it purports to give any effect to passports, is imperfect and inoperative, in consequence of the omission to annex the form of passport to the treaty.

Quære, Whether, if the form had been annexed, and the passport were obtained by fraud and upon false suggestions, it would have the conclusive effect attributed to it by the treaty.

Quære, Whether sailing under enemy's convoy be a substantive cause of condemnation.

By the Spanish treaty of 1795, free ships make free goods; but the form of the passport, by which the freedom of the ship was to have been conclusively established, never having been duly annexed to the treaty, the proprietary interest of the ship is 2*] to be proved according to the ordinary rules of the prize court, and if thus shown to be Spanish, will protect the cargo on board, to whomsoever the latter may belong.

1.—As the form of the commission issued to the privateer in this case is one of the points discussed in the argument, it is thought necessary to insert it.

James Madison, President of the United States of America, to all who shall see these presents, greeting:

Be it known, that in pursuance of an act of Congress, passed on the 26th day of June, one thousand eight hundred and twelve, I have commissioned, and by these presents do commission, the private armed schooner called the Roger, of the burthen of 184 tons, or thereabouts, owned by Thomas E. Gary, Hy. Gary, James B. Cogbill & Co., Brogg & Jones, Hannon & High, Robert Ritchie, Robert Birchett, John Wright, Wm. C. Boswell, Samuel Turner, John G. Heslop, Wm. & Charles Carling, Thomas Shoe, Richard B. Butte, Richard Drummond, Littlebury Estambuck, John Davis, Spencer Drummond, Peter Nestell, and Roger Quarles, mounting fourteen carriage guns, and navigated by ninety men, hereby authorizing Captain —, and John Davis, lieutenant of the said schooner Roger, and the other officers and crew thereof, to subdue, seize, and take any armed or unarmed British vessel, public or private, which shall be found in the jurisdictional limits of the United States, or elsewhere, on the high seas, or within the waters of the British dominions; and such captured vessel, with her apparel, guns and appurtenances, and the goods or effects which shall be found on board the same, together with all the British persons and others, who shall be found acting on board, to bring within some port of the United States; and also to retake any vessels, goods, and effects, of the people of the United States, which may have been captured by any British armed vessels, in order that proceedings may be had concerning such capture or recapture, in due form of law, and as to right and justice shall appertain. The said is further authorized to detain, seize, and take all vessels and effects, to whomsoever belonging, which shall be liable thereto, according to the law of nations, and the rights of the United States, as a power at war, and to bring the same within some port of the United States, in order that due proceedings may be had thereon—this commission to continue in force during the pleasure of the President of the United States, for the time being.

Given under my hand, and the seal of the United States of America, at the city of Washington, the 24th day of April, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and thirteen, and of the independence of the said states the thirty-seventh.

(Signed) JAMES MADISON.
By the President,
(Signed) JAMES MONROE, Secretary of State.

Wheat. 6.

By the rules of the prize court, the onus probandi of a neutral interest rests on the claimant.

The evidence to acquit or condemn, must come, in the first instance, from the ship's papers, and the examination of the captured persons.

Where these are not satisfactory, further proof may be admitted, if the claimant has not forfeited his right to it by a breach of good faith.

On the production of further proof, if the neutrality of the property is not established beyond reasonable doubt, condemnation follows.

The assertion of a false claim, in whole or in part, by an agent, or in connivance with the real owner, is a substantive cause of condemnation.

A PPEAL from the Circuit Court of North Carolina.

This was the case of a ship and cargo, sailing under Spanish colors, and captured by the privateer Roger, Quarles, master,<sup>1</sup> on an ostensible voyage *from Havana to Ham- [*3 burg, but really destined for London, or with an alternative destination, and orders to touch in England for information as to markets, and further instructions. The ship sailed from the Havana, on the 24th of November, 1814, under *convoy of the British frigate Ister, [*4 with which she parted company on the 1st of December, the frigate having gone in chase of an American privateer; and on the 3d of December, was captured by the privateer Roger,

The said is further authorized to detain, seize, and take all vessels and effects, to whomsoever belonging, which shall be liable thereto, according to the law of nations, and the rights of the United States, as a power at war, and to bring the same within some port of the United States, in order that due proceedings may be had thereon—this commission to continue in force during the pleasure of the President of the United States, for the time being.

and carried into Wilmington, North Carolina, for adjudication. The ship and cargo were condemned as prize of war in the District Court of North Carolina, and the sentence was, after the admission of further proof in the Circuit Court, affirmed by that court. An appeal was then allowed to this court, with permission to introduce new proof here, if this court should choose to receive it.

The original evidence consisted of the papers found on board the captured vessel, and delivered up to the captors, by the master, at the time of the capture; and of certain other documents afterwards found concealed on board, or in the possession of Rahlives, the supercargo, or of one Masuco, alias Burr, a passenger on board the Isabella. Some of the ship's papers were mutilated, and attempted to be destroyed, and others were thrown overboard, and spoiled.

The paper of which the following is a translation, was the only one delivered up by the master, at the time of the capture: "Don Jose Sedano, Administrator-General of the Royal Revenues of this port of Havana, in the island of Cuba, &c., certify that by authority and knowledge of the general administrator of the revenues under my charge, permission has been given to ship in the Spanish ship called the Isabel, Captain Don Francisco Cacho, with destination for Hamburg, viz.:

October 28th, 1803, to Brown & Co., at Rio Janiero, introducing Rahlives as "particularly connected with our intimate and respectable friend Mr. George Von Harten, of London, and John Gobel, of Havana, on whose behalf he will probably visit you very shortly. It is probable Mr. Rahlives may entrust to your management some transactions for account of said friends, and others, and we beg to assure you we feel convinced every satisfaction will result from such business as he may have to conduct." (9) The following circular: "Havana, 1st May, 1812. On the 15th last May, we took the liberty of addressing our friends from London, requesting their countenance to an establishment we intended to form in this city under the firm of Von Harten, Gobel & Co. We now have the satisfaction to inform you of our complete success in organizing and consolidating the same, and that we are in every respect enabled to procure to our correspondents all those advantages which may result from intelligence, activity, and the most respectable connections in this island. Political considerations, however, induce us to carry on our affairs for the future under the sole [9*] *name and firm of Mr. John Gobel, who is permanently to reside in this country," &c. (10) An account of sales, dated Havana, November 16th, 1814, signed by J. Gobel, of the cargo of the English brig Portsea, received from Rio de Janeiro, on account of Messrs. Brown, Weston & Co., and of Rahlives, amounting to $20,313 net proceeds, leaving to the credit of Rahlives, in Gobel's hands, half of that sum. (11) A charter-party, executed at Rio de Janeiro, May 11th, 1814, between Weston and Gobel, letting to him the Portsea, and consigning the cargo to the charterer. (12) The following letter from Munos to Rahlives: "Havana, 10th Nov. 1814. Sir, I enclose you invoice and bill of lading showing to have shipped in my ship called La Amable Isabel, Capt. Don Francisco Cacho, 1,104 boxes of sugar, and 40 half boxes of ditto, and 200 quintals of dye-wood, the principal amount of which and charges amounts to $60,642.3, which cargo consigned to you, you will please to take charge of on your arrival at Hamburg, or at any other port you may find convenient to go, proceeding to sell it on the most advantageous terms you can obtain, that with the proceeds you may make the returns according to the instructions I have verbally communicated to you. In like manner I recommend to you, and place under your care, my said vessel, in order that the adventure may have the most favorable termination, to which end I have given definitive orders to the Captain, Don Francisco Cacho, that he may observe the instructions you may communicate to him in my name. As I am so well satisfied with [10*] *your care and diligence, and the friendship my house entertains for you, I shall omit any further advice, wishing you a prosperous voyage, and that you may duly advise me of your proceedings, and communicate such instructions as you may think fit. Yours, &c." (13) A bill of lading signed by the master, Cacho, acknowledging the receipt of the cargo, and engaging to deliver it to Rahlives at Hamburg, or at the port where his register might be verified. fest of the cargo of the Spanish ship La Amable Isabel, in its voyage from this port of Havana to that of London;" and signed by the master: being stated in the margin that he had signed bills of lading therefor "to Don Alonzo Benigno Munos, which he has registered on his own account and risk, and to the consignment of Horace Solly, of London."

Among the mutilated papers found on board were, (1) various accounts between Rahlives and F. Thieson. (2) An invoice of jerked beef and tallow, shipped from Rio de Janeiro to Havana. (3) Another invoice of the same, "for account and risk of Mr. Alonzo Benigno Munos at Havana," per brig Isis, Capt. Brenner, amounting to $22,371. (4) Invoice of sugars, &c., shipped on board the Isis at Havana by order of Rahlives, signed by Gobel, and amounting to $50,671. (5) Another invoice of the same, shipped on board the Isis, "for Falmouth and a market, to the orders of G. Van Harten, Esq., in London," signed by Rahlives, and various accounts between the different parties.

*A claim was given in for the ship and [*11 cargo, as the property of Don Alonzo Benigno Munos, by Rahlives, the supercargo, as agent for the alleged owner; and the captured persons were examined on the standing interrogatories.

Upon the order for further proof, the affidavits of the claimant and his clerks, to the proprietary interest of the ship and cargo, in him, were produced, and the proceedings before the tribunal of the Consulado, at the Havana, under which the ship, which had arrived at that port from New Providence, was sold under the bottomry bond alleged to be given for repairs by one John Cook, to the claimant, and was naturalized as a Spanish vessel. A great mass of testimony was also produced, tending (among other things) to show that the claimant, who was father-in-law of Gobel, had not been actively engaged in trade for many years before this shipment was made; and that Gobel, not being a Spanish subject, all his foreign business, and his transactions with the custom-house, had constantly been carried on in the name of Munos.

Mr. Gaston, for the appellant and claimant, argued: 1. That the prize allegation, in this case, ought to be dismissed, because the libellants had shown no lawful authority to make the capture in question, and, therefore, condemnation could not be pronounced in favor of the captors; but, even if the proprietary interest were proved to be enemy's it must be condemned as a droit of admiralty to the use of the government. It is a well-established principle *of the law of prize, that the captors [*12 must show an authority to capture as prize, and exhibit their title deeds.<sup>1</sup> Here the commission is issued to the vessel itself, without naming the commander who is to direct her operations as a cruiser. The commander, by whom the seizure was actually made, had no commission or authority whatever, other than what was delegated to him by the owners of the vessel. The capture is, therefore, null, so far as respects the captors. On general principles, no persons can rightfully carry on war but those who have a particular authority from the sovereign power of the state. With regard to private armed vessels, unless they have a public commission, their acts are absolutely unlawful, and all on board may be treated as pirates.<sup>1</sup> At all events, they can derive no title under captures thus made, unless they have a commission. In bello porta cedunt rei-publicæ; and all the rights of prize are derived from the grant of the sovereign power. Nor can the commission be issued to the inanimate machine. It must be to the organized association of human beings who are to control and direct its force. Without a head to control and govern them, such an association would be nothing but a band of pirates. The interests of mankind will not tolerate the existence of such a monster as a ship of war without a lawful commander. Even when thus governed, they require to be watched with vigilance, and controlled by the government, least they involve 13* the nation with its allies, *or with neutrals.<sup>2</sup> For this purpose it is necessary that the government should designate and commission their officers. So strict is the doctrine of the Court of Admiralty on this subject, that a capture made by a public commissioned ship, the commander not being on board at the time, is regarded as if made without a commission.<sup>3</sup> So, also, by our own law, the act declaring war, June 18th, 1812, c. 425, authorizes the President to issue commissions or letters of marque and reprisal, in such form as he shall think proper to dictate; and in the form which he has actually prescribed, the names of the captain and lieutenant are required to be inserted. The prize act of June 26th, 1812, c. 430, imposes very strict duties upon the commander, which he is to perform personally, and cannot devolve upon another. He is, among other things, to give bond, and is made responsible for his own misconduct and that of the crew; is to receive and execute the President's instructions; is to keep a journal of the ship's transactions; and by his personal negligence or misconduct, may forfeit the commission, and the rights of prize derived under it. Most clearly the government has a right to judge of the merits and qualifications of the person to be invested with a trust so high and important. But the government has not delegated it to the captors, in the present case, and, therefore, they have no right to demand condemnation to their use. Nor has the government itself in 14* *terposed; nor, indeed, can it interpose, to require condemnation to its own use, until the preliminary question of prize or no prize is determined and the court is about to distribute the proceeds.<sup>4</sup> No final decree of condemnation can, therefore, now be pronounced.

2. The testimony furnished by the papers found on board the captured vessel is such, as, according to the treaty between the United States and Spain of 1795, is conclusive on the question, and entitles the claimant to immediate restitution. This treaty forms a conventional law on the subject of neutral commerce, essentially different from the general law on the same subject.<sup>5</sup> By the 15th article it is stipulated, that the ships of either nation may sail from any port to those of a country which may be at war with either or both nations, and may go to neutral places, or to other enemy ports; and that every article on board, except contraband, to whomsoever belonging, shall be free. In order to carry into effect this stipulation for the unlimited liberty of commerce, and that free ships shall make free goods, it is provided by the 17th article, that the vessel shall be furnished with a passport expressing her national character, and with certificates to show that the cargo is not contraband. To this passport a conclusive effect is attributed. It establishes the national character of the ship; and that being proved, *renders it immaterial [*15 to inquire respecting the cargo, except so far as to ascertain by the certificate that it is not contraband. The 18th article requires the cruisers of either party, meeting the merchant vessels of the other upon the high seas, to remain out of cannonshot, and only authorizes them to send on board two or three men, and if the passport be exhibited, the vessel is not to be molested; and by the 17th article, if the prescribed documents are not exhibited, she may be sent in for adjudication, and condemned as prize, unless testimony entirely equivalent shall be produced. The ship now in question, was furnished with such a passport and certificate as the treaty prescribes. It is true, that the form of passport, intended to have been annexed to the treaty, never was, in fact, annexed by the negotiators, owing to accident or negligence, or some other cause which we cannot now explain. We are not, however, without the means of ascertaining what will satisfy the requisitions of the treaty. A passport, or sea-letter, is a well-known document in the usage of maritime commerce, and is defined to be a permission from a neutral state to the master of a ship to proceed on his proposed voyage, usually containing his name and residence, and the name, property, tonnage and destination of the ship.<sup>6</sup> Although it evidences the permission of the state to navigate the seas, yet it does not, therefore, follow, that it must issue directly from the supreme power *of the state; and some authority ought to [*16 be shown to support such a position. This erroneous notion, probably, arises from the practice of our own country, which is different from that of all other nations. Previous to the year 1793, no other documents were furnished to the merchant vessels of the United States but the certificate of registry and clearance; but the depredations upon our commerce having commenced with the European war which broke out in that year, a form of sea-letter was devised, and to give it greater effect, was signed by the President. On the 28th of November, 1795, a treaty was made with Algiers, by which a passport was to protect our vessels from capture by Algerian cruisers. By the act of the 1st of June, 1796, c. 339, Congress authorized the Secretary of State to prepare a form, which, when approved by the President, should be the form of the passport. Neither the treaty nor the law required the President's signature, but the form prepared was signed by the President, as the sea-letter had been. But this, our peculiar practice, forms no rule of conduct obligatory on others; and will not authorize us to give a more restricted meaning to the term used in a treaty than the general usage of nations will warrant. The word passport,<sup>1</sup> thus used, is taken from the same word, signifying a permission given to individuals to remove from one 17 place to another, and the documents are analogous. Vattel states, that, "like every other act of supreme cognizance, all safe-conducts or passports flow from the sovereign authority; but the prince may delegate to his officers the power of furnishing them, and with this they are invested, either by express commission, or in consequence of the nature of their function. A general of an army, from the nature of his post, can grant them; and as they are derived, though mediately, from the same prince, all his generals are bound to respect them."<sup>2</sup> So, also, Blackstone speaks of the offense of violating passports, or safe-conducts, granted by the king or his ambassadors.<sup>3</sup> It is, then, incidental to the commission of an admiral or general, or public minister, to issue these documents of protection for persons or property.<sup>4</sup> By the usage of all commercial countries, they are issued by the superior officers superintending the marine affairs of the kingdom, province, city, or colony, where granted, and as representing the sovereign in those places. In France, they have always been issued by the admiral of France, except during the revolution when they were issued by the minister of 18 marine.<sup>5</sup> *In the King of Prussia's ordinance of neutrality, passports and sea-letters are spoken of as issuing from admiralties, maritime colleges, or magistrates of cities.<sup>6</sup> And in the celebrated answer to the Prussian Exposition des Motifs, it is said, that until the year 1746, the usual document was a certificate from the admiralty that the ship was Prussian. Afterwards a pass under the royal seal of the regency of Pomerania at Stettin was used.<sup>7</sup> In our treaty with Holland, the form of a sea-letter is given, which is in the name of the burgomasters and regents of the city, acting under an ordinance of the states general. In England such documents are issued by the lords commissioners of the admiralty, as is shown by the papers in the case of The Nereide in this court;<sup>8</sup> and on foreign stations, they may be issued by the admirals commanding those stations. In the famous Black Book of the Admiralty, we find it laid down, that all intercourse with the enemy is prohibited, unless under a special license from the king or his admiral.<sup>9</sup> In the case of the ships taken at Genoa,<sup>10</sup> Sir W. Scott declares, that Lord Keith, as admiral commanding the expedition, had a right to grant passports to protect the ships sailing under them. And in this court the licenses issued by Admiral Sawyer, and countersigned by a *British consul, were deter-[19 mined to be passports which would protect against British capture.<sup>11</sup> At Gibraltar, these documents are issued in the name of, and signed by, the commissioners of the admiralty at that place.<sup>12</sup> As to the usage of Spain, it appears by a royal passport, found on board the Isabella, and issued for another ship called the Clara, to be usually issued at home by the secretary of the marine in the king's name; but it also appears by an indorsement on this very paper, that the Spanish commandants of foreign stations, or Apostaderos, may alter such passports, and grant liberty to change the course of the voyage. And they may also issue original passports, in their own name, where there is a deficiency of royal passports, and the vessel has not been previously documented. Such is the passport which was issued to the Isabella in the present case. The power to issue such documents of protection, is necessarily incident to the vast authorities conferred on the Spanish colonial governors; and the ease of the British ship of war Eliza, which was compelled to enter the port of Havana in distress, in time of war, and to which the captain-general, after relieving her wants, gave a passport to protect her from capture, is an example of the exercise of the power in question highly honorable to the generosity of the Spanish character.<sup>13</sup> The treaty under which *protection is [20 now claimed, was conceived in the spirit of that benevolent policy so long cherished by the United States, and which Spain has reciprocated. It has for its object to limit the range of warfare on the high seas, and to extend the immunities of the neutral flag. In this spirit it ought to be construed. A comparison of its provisions with those of other conventions for the same object, will show the correctness of the interpretation for which we contend. In the French treaty of 1778,<sup>14</sup> which was the forerunner of the armed neutrality of 1780, a passport or sea-letter in a certain form is provided to protect the ship. But there is nothing from which it can be inferred that this document is to issue from the supreme executive of the respective nations. To show how subordinate a consideration was that of form, it is deserving of remark, that the form actually annexed to the treaty, omits a circumstance which the text of the treaty expressly requires—"the place of residence of the master." So that a passport precisely corresponding with the form annexed, was adjudged by the Court of K. B.

in England, who had not seen the annexed form, to be substantially defective in this respect, and thus to falsify the warranty of neutrality in a policy of insurance.<sup>1</sup> So the treaty with Holland, of 1782,<sup>2</sup> contains analogous stipulations with those of the Spanish treaty. It 21* gives the form *of a passport, and of a sea-letter, which are afterwards spoken of as the same, or at least, as equipollent documents. The passport does not show by whom it is to be signed; but it shows that it may be issued by individuals signing their own names, and affixing their own private seals, and that it was not thought necessary that it should issue in the name of the chief magistrate; and the sea-letter is unequivocally to be issued by an authority less than the supreme power of the state. The treaty of 1783, with Sweden,<sup>3</sup> repeats the same stipulations of the unlimited liberty of commerce, and that free ships should make free goods; and to prevent disputes, a passport or sea-letter is to be furnished, showing that the vessel belongs to a subject, which is to protect from all further inquiry, and is to be made out in "good form." Here the form is avowedly left to the exercise of an honest discretion on each side. In the treaty with Prussia, of 1785,<sup>4</sup> the same conclusive effect is attributed to the sea-letter or passport, the former of which was to be subsequently concerted by the contracting parties. From these the treaty with Spain was copied, whose government gloried in being the first among the southern powers of Europe that acceded to the principles or the armed neutrality.<sup>5</sup> One of the leading principles asserted by that confed- 22* eracy, went to exclude *from the jurisdiction of the belligerent prize courts whatever was done under the neutral flag, and to render it matter of negotiation between state and state. A national contract made to carry into effect this principle, is to be construed according to its intention and spirit, which meant to rely upon the justice and honor of both nations, that neither would impart to enemy vessels the immunities which were intended to be confined to neutral property. Enlightened views of interest would induce the neutral state not to permit any but its own subjects to avail themselves of the concession; and though every possible abuse might not be prevented, yet cases of fraud would rarely occur, and the evils produced would be far outweighed by the immense importance of the general security of commerce, and the consequent mitigation of the evils of war. The authority of the Spanish government to issue a passport certifying the proprietary interest in the vessels of its own subjects is unquestionable, and the local law and usage must determine its form, and the authority by which it is to be issued.

3. But supposing the passport produced not to be precisely such as the treaty intended, yet it is insisted, that, with the other documents, it furnishes testimony "entirely equivalent," according to the expression used in the 17th article. It is important to fix the precise meaning of the last clause of that article. The preceding clauses stipulated, that the ship shall have a passport to show that she belongs to the neutral state, and a certificate to show that her cargo *(to whomsoever belonging) is not *23 contraband. By the 18th article, if she is furnished with these documents, she is to be exempt from all detention or molestation. If not furnished with them, she may be carried in for adjudication, and then must account for the omission, and furnish other testimony, which, considering all the circumstances, shall be of equal value with that omitted. Suppose the omission satisfactorily accounted for, what is the equivalent testimony required by the treaty? Most certainly it is that which completely proves the same facts which the omitted documents would have proved. Even a passport, in due form, does not prove that the ship is, in fact, neutral. With whatever formal solemnities it may be clothed, it must issue from the custom-house of the power by whom it is granted. It may be issued improperly. The officers authorized to issue it, may be deceived by fraud and perjury. The possession of the document only proves the fact that the property of the ship has been decided to be neutral by the competent authorities, by those to whom the sovereign power of the state has entrusted the examination of the question. Their determinations are made conclusive by the treaty, and import absolute verity, in the same manner as the solemn judgments of the courts of justice. If, then, this document cannot be had, but its absence is accounted for, and other papers are produced, which however inferior in formal solemnity, unequivocally prove such a decision by the competent authority of the neutral state, then this secondary evidence is completely equivalent to the passport and certificate provided *for in the treaty. This exposition *24 is the only one consistent with the spirit of the treaty, and is in furtherance of its avowed object, which was that the flag should protect the property sailing under it, if used by authority of the neutral nation. This exposition is conformable to the English version of the treaty, but is absolutely required by the Spanish; and even if there were any difference of meaning, we are bound in honor and good faith to adopt the latter, since Spain has always acted upon it, and has seldom or never thought it necessary to document her ships according to the literal requisitions of the treaty. Unless this exposition is admitted, the whole of the clause in question is nugatory. By the universal law and usage of nations, every captured vessel is at liberty to account for the want of formal documents.<sup>6</sup> It would, therefore, have been superfluous to insert a provision in the treaty to this effect. Something more must have been intended by the use of the terms, which are to be found in no other treaty. In the case now before the court, the omission of the required document is fully accounted for by the actual state of the mother country at the time, and by the declaration of the colonial governor when he granted the substituted document. This ought to be considered as equivalent proof, because it next in dignity, and approaches very nearly to a level with the royal passport itself. It is issued by an officer who is only not king; who would have been charged with the delivery and control of royal passports; who expressly declares, that it was issued in *lieu of such; and certifies every fact which would have been stated in a royal passport. The other documents are superadded to that which would alone have been required, had the formal requisitions of the treaty been complied with, and are abundantly sufficient to establish the proprietary interest in the ship. They are supported by the depositions of the captured crew, who are required by the navigation laws of Spain to be Spanish subjects, and whose national character conforms to this requisition.

4. Again. If there be no passport such as is required by the treaty, and no such equivalent testimony as the treaty provides, still the claim to the ship is established by evidence such as the law of nations requires to establish it; and if the property of the ship is shown to be Spanish, that is sufficient to protect the cargo to whomsoever belonging.<sup>1</sup> She is furnished with all the usual documents, and none are of a suspicious or irregular character. They are supported by the testimony of all the witnesses, except one; and he was improperly examined, not being produced in his regular order, but kept back until other witnesses had been examined, contrary to the well-known rule of the prize court, which requires the captors to introduce all the witnesses in succession.<sup>2</sup> Even if the proprietary interest in the cargo should be thought doubtful, that being included in the same claim with the ship, will not necessarily involve both in condemnation; for, an attempt [*26*] to conceal enemy's property only affects the right to further proof.<sup>3</sup> But we insist that further proof is not required in this case; and if the national character of the ship be established by the original evidence, the conventional law entitles us to restitution of the cargo, as a matter of course.<sup>4</sup>

5. Lastly. Supposing the original evidence in the cause insufficient to entitle the claimant to restitution, either according to the provisions of the treaty, or by the general law of nations, it is insisted that all the difficulties of the case are removed by the further proof produced, which establishes the proprietary interest of both ship and cargo as claimed.

Mr. Wheaton, for the captors and respondents, (1) answered the objection taken by the claimant's counsel to the validity of the commission under which the capture was made. This is exclusively a question between the captors and the United States. The claimant has no persona standi in judicio to assert the rights of the United States, and it is not until after the determination of the principal question of prize or no prize, that the claim of the government can be interposed.<sup>5</sup> This is not only our own practice, but is the prize law of France and England, and of the whole maritime world.<sup>6</sup> Even *if the present capture [*27*] be a droit of admiralty, as taken by non-commissioned captors, that will not invalidate the capture, if it be of enemy's property. This is to be determined after a general decree of condemnation is entered, and before a final distribution of the prize proceeds. If the government shall interpose a claim at that stage of the proceedings, it will then be time enough to consider a question in which the foreign claimant has no interest or right to interfere.

2. The vessel and cargo in this case are liable to condemnation as prize of war, having left the Havana with a false destination. The claim sets up an alternative destination, to an enemy's or a neutral port; but it is contradicted by the documentary evidence and the depositions of the captured persons. This false destination is not excusable on the ground of the necessity of deceiving an enemy by clearing out for a neutral port. Spain was at that time at peace with all the world, except her revolted colonies; and both London and Hamburg were equally neutral ports in respect to the South-American cruisers. A false destination under such circumstances is damnable, if the case be so infirm as to require further proof; because it could only be intended to conceal enemy interests, and if alternative, it ought to appear to be such on the face of the papers, in order that captors may not be misled.<sup>7</sup>

*3. The proofs of proprietary interest, [*28*] upon the original evidence, are not such as to entitle the claimant to restitution, without further proof. As to the ship, there is no doubt that if bona fide Spanish property, and documented according to the treaty, she must not only be restored, but the cargo also must be included in the restitution, even if proved to be enemy's property. But it is insisted that the treaty does not extend to a fraudulent use of the Spanish flag to cover enemy's property in the ship as well as the cargo.<sup>8</sup> The passport, even supposing it to be such as the treaty requires, is falsified by the muster-roll and other documents; and it was not produced, as the treaty requires, to the captors, but found on board after the capture. Fraud will vitiate even a judgment, and the most solemn instruments and assurances. This is a principle of universal law, and it would be indecent to suppose that Spain countenances such an improper use of her flag and pass. Is there, then, that equivalent testimony which the treaty substitutes for the formal passports? The law very properly requires the bill of sale to be on board where the vessel is transferred from the original proprietor.<sup>9</sup> Even Hubner, the great champion of neutral rights, admits this to be the rule.<sup>10</sup> But here the vessel is not Spanish built; yet no bill of sale is found on *board, and the [*29* circumstances strongly point to the previous existence of enemy interests in the vessel, which it appears came from New Providence. The purchase of enemy's vessels by neutrals is entirely prohibited by the ordinances of some countries; and our law regards it as suspicious.<sup>1</sup> If still continued to be employed in the enemy's trade, or under the control of an enemy, this is deemed a badge of fraud, and conclusive evidence that there has been no bona fide transfer.<sup>2</sup> The ship then is not documented bona fide, as the treaty requires, nor is the substituted proof equivalent to that for which it is substituted. The ship, therefore, will not protect the cargo, nor is the latter so documented as to protect itself, or avoid being involved in the same fate with the vessel. To be sure, there are the usual formal documents, and so there are in every case. But they contradict each other; and being fraudulently blended in the same false claim with the ship, they must be included in the same condemnation. Both being alleged to belong to the same claimant, and he having attempted to assert a false claim to the ship, the entire claim must be rejected as a penalty for his fraudulent conduct.<sup>3</sup>

4. But the passport in this case, even supposing it not to have been fraudulently obtained and used, is not such as the treaty requires, being issued by an authority incompetent to grant 30* such a document of *protection. It is insisted that nothing less than the solemnly pledged faith of the supreme power of the neutral state to the verity of the facts stated in the passport can possibly satisfy the belligerent. The terms used in the treaty are "sea-letters or passports." One of the contracting parties might understand it as intending a document in the nature of a permanent muniment of the title to the ship. Our laws recognize no other such document, than one signed by the President. The presumption, therefore, is, that our vessels were to be furnished with a sea-letter thus signed, and the Spanish vessels with a royal passport signed by the king. The cases cited on the other side, to show that such a document of protection may be granted by an authority inferior to the supreme power of the state, are not in point. In the British license cases, although this court condemned our vessels sailing under them, yet the British prize courts denied the authority of their admirals and consuls to issue them, and condemn the vessels taken by British cruisers although sailing under these licenses.<sup>4</sup> All the other cases cited are of passports issued by the Lord High Admirals of England or France, acting as the immediate delegates of the royal prerogative, and as the ministers of the crown. There is no doubt that admirals and generals, commanding fleets or armies, have the power of issuing passports for the temporary protection of persons or property, within the limits of their command. But this arises from the necessity of the case, and is incidental to the performance of their 31* official duties. But it is not incidental to any official duty of the Governor and Captain-General of the Island of Cuba, that he should have the power of naturalizing foreign ships, giving them all the privileges of Spanish-built vessels, and grant passports to protect them against belligerent scrutiny. Non ei rei proponitur. It is highly improbable that the government of this country would have agreed to a stipulation so improvident, under which the whole navigation of our enemy might be screened from capture by a mere fictitious adoption, fraudulently or corruptly obtained for this purpose. The form of this important document being omitted, either from accident or design, there is the more necessity of looking to the substance of the contract; since, if the form had been annexed, there is no doubt that it would have required the highest authority of the state to grant a document so conclusive. The passport or sea letter provided by this treaty, is not a mere ordinary license or safe-conduct given by a general or admiral, for a temporary purpose, and within the limits of his command. It is the supreme power of the neutral state solemnly pledging itself to the belligerent, that the property of the ship is truly and bona fide neutral. The doctrine contended for on the part of the claimant, would go the length of entirely abolishing maritime captures; since the passport may be issued by any authority, however inferior and however remote his functions may be from such a duty. The treaty provides, that the certificates which are required relative to the cargo, shall be issued by the officer of the place *whence the [32] vessel sails, and the same proviso would have been made as to the passport, had it been intended to entrust the local magistrates with the power of granting it. Neither does an examination of the forms of similar documents annexed to other treaties, containing the same stipulation, that free ships shall make free goods, justify the inference, that they may be issued by any authority less than the highest. So, also, the celebrated convention of 1801, between Great Britain and Russia, though it does not contain such a stipulation, but, on the contrary, subjects enemy's property in neutral vessels to capture, yet it provides for similar documents of protection, and in the formula annexed, it is stated, that they are "to be delivered in the respective admiralties of the two high contracting parties."<sup>5</sup> But the question has already been determined in this court, in the case of The Pizarro.<sup>6</sup> In that case, the court say: "It is certainly true, that the vessel was not furnished with such a sea-letter, &c., as are described in the 17th article." But she had on board the proceedings under which she was naturalized in East Florida, and a certificate from the Spanish consul at Liverpool, certifying that "Captain Don Antonio Martinez, commanding the Spanish ship called the Pizarro, of the burthen of 273 tons, registered at the port of St. Augustine de la Florida, which came to this port from the island of Amelia, with a cargo, now sails for the port of Here, then, was a certificate, stating the name, burthen, and property of the ship, and the name of the master, and issued by an authority as competent as the Governor of Cuba. Yet the court held it not to be a compliance with the terms of the treaty, and required further proof of the proprietary interest.

5. Supposing, however, this vessel and cargo to be documented as the treaty requires, it is insisted that they are liable to condemnation for sailing under the protection of enemy's convoy. It is true, that the Isabella parted company with the convoying ship before the capture; but it was a mere temporary separation, the latter having gone in pursuit of one of our privateers. Although the court has determined, in the cases of The Nereide<sup>1</sup> and The Atalanta,<sup>2</sup> that a neutral may lawfully put his goods on board an armed enemy's vessel, yet it has not determined that he may put his vessel and goods under convoy of the enemy's fleet. The distinction between the two classes of cases is stated by one of the learned judges of this court, in delivering his opinion in The Atalanta,<sup>3</sup> and the Lords of Appeal in England have held the offense of sailing under the protection of enemy's convoy to be a conclusive cause of condemnation.<sup>4</sup> So, also, where certain merchant ships belonging to the Hanse towns had 34*] put themselves under *the protection of Swedish convoy, the latter having assumed a hostile character for the purpose of resisting the right of search, they were equally held liable to confiscation.<sup>5</sup> Such, also, is the law of Denmark, a state that has always professed to maintain the mildest principles of prize law.<sup>6</sup> In his correspondence with the Danish government, Mr. Erving, our minister, admits the extreme difficulty of upholding the contrary doctrine; and only seeks to escape from it by contending that the rule could not extend to vessels forced into the convoy, or accidentally involved in the enemy's fleet; and this may readily be admitted without at all weakening the force of the general rule.

6. This is an aggravated case of spoliation and concealment of papers. Were this Spaniard to be tried by his own law, he would be instantly condemned. By the law of the whole world, except that of the United States and Great Britain, spoliation of papers is per se a cause of confiscation; and by our law it is all but damnatory. If the spoliation is unexplained, or the explanation is unsatisfactory; if the cause labors under heavy suspicions or gross prevarications, further proof is denied, and condemnation inevitably follows.<sup>7</sup> And it is a relaxation of the rules of the prize court to allow further proof even where there has been a mere concealment of *papers.<sup>9</sup> But [*35 here are both suppression and spoliation; and a case which escapes from this imputation (to use the emphatic language of Sir W. Scott), "is saved as by fire."<sup>8</sup> In the present case, the spoliation and concealment are not only unexplained, but inflame the other circumstances of suspicion. The acts of the supercargo, in this respect, bind the owners, because he is their confidential agent; and the ship-owner is always bound by the misconduct of the master in all respects.<sup>10</sup> So, also, the act of the master binds the owner of the cargo, if he is also the owner of the ship;<sup>11</sup> and according to a decision of the Lords of Appeal, whether he is owner of the ship or not.<sup>12</sup> The act of the agent or consignee of the cargo is conclusive upon the owner of the cargo.<sup>13</sup> And if the case be such as to require further proof, it is to be granted or denied under the Spanish treaty, precisely in the same circumstances in which it would be granted or denied by the pre-existing law of nations.<sup>14</sup> But by the general law, this is a case in *which it would [*36 be refused, and therefore it is an exception to the immunity secured by the treaty.

7. Finally. Even if further proof were admissible, the further proof produced does not establish the proprietary interest in a satisfactory manner. It is not incumbent on the captors to show to whom the property really belongs. It is sufficient that it does not belong as claimed.<sup>15</sup>

The Attorney-General, on the same side, insisted that the case was not within the protection of the treaty, because the vessel was not documented according to its provisions, and the only paper which could possibly answer to the description of the sea-letter or passport, required by the 17th article, was concealed, and not shown by the master to the captors, as provided by the 18th; so that they had a right to detain and send in the vessel for adjudication. Being thus subjected to the ordinary jurisdiction of the prize court, she is to be tried by the ordinary rules of the prize law, independent of the treaty. This court has already determined in another case, that the equivalent testimony, required by the 17th article, is to be such as the prize court would require, independent of the stipulations of the treaty.<sup>16</sup> No other testimony could give the "legal satisfaction" which the treaty demands. In a case requiring further proof, the equivalent testimony is that further proof; and the grant or denial of this *must rest upon the ordinary rules of the [*37 court.<sup>17</sup> But here the claimant has forfeited his right to further proof, by his own aggravated misconduct in concealing the destination, and spoliating and suppressing the ship's papers, which it was his duty, both by the treaty and the general law of nations, to exhibit to the captors voluntarily and fairly. But supposing the passport to have been delivered to the captors at the time of the seizure, as it ought to have been, and suppose the usage of Spain to supply the omission of the form being annexed to the treaty, still the document produced is not such a passport as that usage requires. This is shown by the very terms of the document produced, which state it to have been issued "for want of royal passports." It is said that this is justified by the local usages of the colony; but we are not bound to know those usages, or to admit that this governor had the authority to substitute his passport for one signed by the king. The document required by the treaty, then, not being found on board, the parties are to give "legal satisfaction of their property by testimony entirely equivalent." This testimony is to be, according to the course of the prize court, the papers found on board, and the examinations in preparatorio. But these papers and depositions, so far from satisfying the conscience of the court, increase the suspicions excited by the want of the documents required by the treaty; documents so easily procured where the property is 38* really Spanish, and the vessel *fairly entitled to the privileges of a Spanish ship, that it is incredible any such vessel should want them. The onus probandi is on the claimant in such a case under the treaty, precisely as it would be by the general law of nations, independent of the special provisions of the treaty; and the question of proprietary interest is to be determined just as that question would be in any other case of prize. The investigation in the prize court is substituted in lieu of the investigation by the captors at sea, which last was to be entirely concluded by the treaty documents, if the ship was furnished with them; if not, she was liable to be brought in to ascertain the character of the ship, which, if adjudged to be Spanish, the same consequence of protection to the cargo will follow, as if the ship had been regularly documented according to the treaty. It is not the possession of papers equivalent, in formal effect, to those required by the treaty which will protect her from further inquiry, but she must have papers which will produce the effect of giving satisfactory evidence of the proprietary interest according to the ordinary rules of the prize court. If the substituted documents were fraudulently obtained and used, would that be satisfactory evidence? The spirit and intention of a treaty is always to be regarded in its interpretation.<sup>1</sup> Every object of such a treaty would be entirely defeated by permitting an enemy to avail himself of provisions contained in it, and intended for the exclusive benefit of a friend; and even 39* if a *Spanish subject, by perpetrating a fraud upon his own government, leads the protection of its flag to a foreigner, that Spaniard becomes himself an enemy, and cannot justly complain if he suffers the fate of an enemy.

It is no disrespect to Spain, or disregard of her national rights, to refuse the benefit of her flag and pass, where they have been obtained by practicing an imposition upon her officers. She can claim no greater respect for their acts than is conceded to the judgments of the highest courts of justice. But even these are vitiated by fraud, according to the law of every country. Great Britain so understands the effect of a similar treaty stipulation. In the case of the Cittade de Lisboa,<sup>2</sup> which was determined under the British treaty with Portugal, containing the principle of free ships, free goods, though the vessel had the Portuguese flag and pass, she was condemned because a box of papers was found on board falsifying the claim, and showing the property to be enemy's; and to give more solemnity to the judgment of the court, the Portuguese consul was called in to witness it, and admonished to advise his government to be more vigilant over the conduct of its officers in this respect. So, also, our own court of appeals in prize causes, during the war of the revolution, held the general maxim of free ships, free goods, which had been temporarily recognized in an ordinance of Congress, not to extend to a case of fraudulent combination between the enemy and neutrals to defeat the belligerent rights of the United States and her ally.<sup>3</sup> In that case, the court observed, *that Congress had not said that [40 a violated neutrality should protect; and the mention of some exceptions to the general immunity (such as contraband, &c.), does not exclude others, equally flagrant, though not mentioned. So in this case, the exceptions of blockade and contraband do not exclude other cases of unneutral conduct; and some implied exceptions there must be, or how could the court engraft the exceptions of the property, of citizens of the United States trading with the enemy, or of Spanish subjects not actually domiciled within the dominions of Spain, both of which cases are excluded from the general operation of the treaty, according to the opinion of this court in The Pizarro.<sup>4</sup> If, then, the case is not within the protection of the treaty, does either the original evidence, or the further proof, satisfy the court of the property of the ship and cargo being as claimed? This inquiry cannot be limited to the ship, because if that was really Spanish, it would be sufficient to protect the cargo also; but both are included in the same claim, which is given for the same person; and if the claim for the cargo be false, that will also affect the claim to the ship. If the ship was Spanish property, why seek to show that the cargo was Spanish also? The proprietary interest in the ship is supposed to have been acquired under a judicial sale upon a bottomry bond. But the previous history of the ship is not satisfactorily explained, and so far as it is given, points to an enemy origin; and the proceedings under which the sale was *had, are manifestly collusive and fraud- [41 ulent. The claim to the cargo is also supported by mere formal documents, unsupported by the oaths of witnesses, and contradicted by the evidentia rei. The spoliation and concealment of the papers are not satisfactorily explained.

Such explanation could only proceed upon the ground of the papers being innocent in themselves, and that they were destroyed from a necessity unconnected with an attempt to evade the right of search. But as to the papers thrown overboard, all that we know of their character is, that they came from the counting house of the claimant, who ordered them to be thrown overboard, in case of capture; and as to the supposed necessity of destroying them, the only reason alleged is the fear of South American cruisers. This could not be the true reason, since the papers retained on board would equally show the Spanish ownership of the ship and cargo, which it is now insisted they are sufficient to establish. And as to the papers mutilated and concealed, a careful inspection of them will satisfy the court that they point to the English origin of the adventure, and to English interests in its results. The learned counsel concluded by a very minute and able analysis of the proofs of proprietary interest.

Mr. Harper, for the claimant and appellant, in reply, (1) insisted that the destination of the vessel, in this case, was not a false destination; and that even a false destination is not 42* a substantive cause of condemnation. *A false destination, is an unlawful destination concealed; but here the alternative destination did, in fact, appear on the face of the papers, and both London and Hamburg were equally lawful ports for Spanish vessels to trade with. In the cases of The Suffolk Anna<sup>1</sup> and The Welvaart,<sup>2</sup> the false destination was combined with other circumstances of illegal conduct or suspicion, and the condemnation did not proceed upon that ground alone. In the case of The Nancy,<sup>3</sup> it was also connected with the offense of carrying contraband goods on the outward voyage. So the case of The Mars,<sup>4</sup> was that of engaging in the colonial trade of the enemy, attempted to be concealed by a false destination; and further proof being necessary, it was refused on account of those circumstances of fraud and illegality.

2. Nor ought the present case to be affected by the fact of the vessel having set sail from the Havanna under convoy of a British frigate. This protection was necessary against South American cruisers, to whom Spanish property would have been good prize. But the Isabella intended to leave her convoy off the coast of Florida, and such an intention admits of a locus penitentie which was availed of; for she had in fact left the fleet, before the capture. The case of the Hanse vessels taken under Swedish convoy was very different from this.<sup>5</sup> The Swedish 43* armed vessels prepared to resist, and only yielded to the terror of a superior force; and the Hanse vessels were affected by what was considered as an actual resistance of the convoy, having associated themselves under its protection.

3. As to the spoliation and concealment of papers, the facts do not warrant the inference of its having been done for unlawful purposes. There is no evidence whatever that the papers thrown overboard were connected with this transaction. The concealed papers were innocent; and were even essential to show the Spanish interest in the cargo; and as to the mutilation, if practiced at all, it must have been by the captors themselves, as they alone had an interest in defacing papers which were material to the claimant's proofs of property. The fact as to the papers thrown overboard was frankly and freely disclosed by the parties who alone had any knowledge of it, and a satisfactory reason for their conduct assigned by them on their first examination. Even supposing, however, that the fact of the spoliation and suppression of papers would, under other circumstances, exclude the claimant from the benefit of further proof, it is now too late for the captors to object, an order for further proof having been granted in the court below, without any objection on their part.<sup>6</sup>

4. The passport in this case is sufficient to establish the national character of the ship, so as to protect both her and the cargo under the treaty with *Spain. It is one of a series [*44 of passports issued by the Governor of the Island of Cuba; is numbered 94, showing that many more of the same kind had been issued; and the words "for want of royal passports" are printed, which circumstance shows that it was an established formula. The circumstances of the Spanish nation at that period, when Ferdinand had been just restored to the throne, sufficiently explain the cause of the defect of passports, with the king's sign-manual. The very act of exercising such an authority on the part of the colonial governor, is strong prima facie evidence of his possessing the power; and until rebutted by some contrary proof, must be considered as conclusive that such is the usage of Spain. There is no substantial difference between such a document and royal passports; since the latter must be issued in blank, and sent to the different ports throughout the extent of the Spanish dominions, and the distribution of them entrusted to subordinate officers, so that the same frauds may be perpetrated, as are imagined in the present instance. What better security have we that the royal passport itself will not be employed to protect the trade of our enemy? It may be safely admitted, that you may inquire so far as to ascertain that the passport is not forged, or obtained by criminal means, or fraudulently applied to a vessel, for which it was not issued. But if none of these circumstances occur, and the passport regularly issues, from an authority which is competent to grant it according to the local usages of the neutral country, the treaty makes it conclusive, on the question of *property. In [*45 this case, the passport was granted, under a judicial decree of the Consulado, at the Havanna, proceeding according to the course of the Court of Admiralty, to enforce a bottomry bond, given for repairs to the ship. The sentences of foreign tribunals, having jurisdiction of the subject-matter, and proceeding in rem, are considered as conclusive, by the law of this, and every other country, wherever the title to the thing comes incidentally, or directly, in controversy. Here it is the very question in issue before the court; and the decision of the Spanish tribunal not only warranted the Governor of Cuba in granting the passport, but even if he had not issued it, would bind this court to consider the property as Spanish. Therefore, admitting that the captors had a right to bring in this vessel for adjudication, because she had not the passport required by the treaty, or because it was not exhibited to them at the time of the capture, still the equivalent proof is more than sufficient to supply the want of a passport in any form that can be conceived; because, it shows that the ship was entitled to every document which could prove her to be a Spanish ship, the tribunal of the Consulado having adjudged her to be Spanish property. The captors may possibly be exempt from costs and damages; but it does not, therefore, follow, that the case is taken entirely out of the special provisions of the treaty, and left at large to be determined under the law of nations. The object of the treaty was to provide, that neutral vessels should protect goods to whomsoever belonging, with the exception of contraband only. 46*] The *passport was to be conclusive of the neutrality of the ship, and the certificate was to show, that the cargo was not contraband. If these documents are wanting, then the property of the ship is to be established by equivalent testimony; and that being shown to be neutral, will protect the cargo, even if enemy's property, unless, indeed, it consist of contraband articles. The "equivalent testimony" required, must mean, that other documents shall be produced which will prove precisely the same facts that were intended to be proved by the passport and certificate; and not that sort of evidence which the technical rules of the prize court demand in a case requiring further proof. Doubtless the intention of the contracting parties is to be regarded in construing treaties, as it is in the interpretation of all other instruments; but that intention is to be gathered from the words they use. Although there are many treaties consecrating the maxim, that free ships shall make free goods, there is no other example of a treaty stipulating what should be conclusive evidence of the freedom of the ship. The parties to this treaty intended to exclude the jurisdiction of the prize courts of the belligerent as far as possible, by forbidding the detention of vessels having the required documents, and where they were carried in for adjudication for want of these documents, limiting the inquiry of the prize courts to such testimony as should be equivalent. All the cases cited on the other side, of the supposed exception to the general immunity, are cases arising under treaties or ordinances, merely recognizing the principle, 47*] that free *ships should make free goods, without providing any rule of evidence to establish the national character of the ship, and leaving that question to be determined by the general law of nations. But here the conventional law adopts a new rule of evidence, from which the court is not at liberty to depart.

The learned counsel also argued the question of proprietary interest with great minuteness and ability.

The court directed the cause to be re-argued upon the point as to the form and effect of the passport.

The Attorney-General, for the captors and respondents, insisted, that the form of passport to which an effect so important was attributed, not having been annexed to the original treaty by the contracting parties, could not now be supplied by the judicial tribunals of either. Such an attempt would be an encroachment on the treaty-making power, which, in our government, is exclusively confided to the President and senate. The office of this court is to construe, not to make or amend treaties. The treaty (art. 17) provides, that "the ships and vessels belonging to the subjects or people of the other party must be furnished with sea-letters or passports, expressing the name, property, and bulk of the ship, as also the name and place of habitation of the master of the said ship, that it may appear thereby that the ship really and truly belongs to the subjects of one of the parties, which passport shall be made out and granted according to the form annexed to this treaty." These particulars were required to be inserted for *the purpose of identifying the vessel to which the passport was intended to apply, and to satisfy the other contracting party that she is really entitled to the immunities stipulated in the treaty. The passport in the present case was either intended to certify that the ship was Captain Cacho's, or not. The words are, "Captain — Cacho, with his Spanish ship called," &c. If Cacho was meant to be certified to be the owner, the claim does not conform to it. He expressly swears that it is not his, but that it belongs exclusively to Munos, who claims. Nobody else can have restitution but the actual claimant, and he is not certified in the passport to be the owner. But the term, "his Spanish ship," is evidently a mere figurative expression, and means nothing more than the ship of which he is master. What, then, is the import of the term "Spanish ship?" A certificate that a ship of a certain name, and bulk, and master, is a Spanish ship, is not a certificate that it is Spanish property, or in other words, the property of Spanish subjects, which is alone intended to be protected by the express terms of the article. A vessel may be a Spanish ship by adoption, by having a license to trade with the Indies, without ceasing to be the property of foreigners, or becoming the property of Spanish subjects. It is not sufficient to certify the national character of the ship merely. There must be a certificate that it is the individual property of particular subjects of Spain, for to such alone does the protection of the treaty extend. The treaty being left imperfect in omitting to annex the form of *passport, it is very questionable [*49 whether the stipulation as to its effect as evidence is not wholly void. But admitting that the court can supply the form, how is it to be done? Two modes may be selected. First, to take the literal words of the treaty; and then the passport should have stated the ship to be the property of Munos, the claimant; or, second, the form may be supplied by referring to other treaties similar in their nature. In the form of passport annexed to the French treaties of 1778 and 1801, the master is required to swear that "the ship belongs to one or more of the subjects of ——. The act whereof shall be put at the end of these presents," &c. No form of the oath which is to be thus appended is given; but the Dutch treaty of 1782 shows what the form of the oath would probably be: "C. D., of —, personally appeared before us, and declared by solemn oath that the ship or vessel called, &c., does rightfully and properly belong to him or them only," &c. The terms of these treaties are the same with the Spanish treaty, and require "the name, the property, and the burthen of the vessel," to be expressed. It is not property in the abstract, the national character merely, acquired by a fictitious adoption into the navigation of Spain, but the individual proprietary interest of some Spanish domiciled subject that is to be protected.

Mr. Harper, contra, contended, that the treaty merely required the national character of the property, and not its individual ownership, to be expressed in the passport. There can 50* be no doubt that this passport *must be according to the regular Spanish form, because both this and the royal passport for the Clara, which was also found on board, have the same expression, viz., "his Spanish ship." This is precisely equivalent to a certificate that the ship belongs to Spanish subjects. A warranty in a policy of insurance that a ship is an American ship, is a warranty that she is the property of citizens of the United States. The form of passport which was intended to have been annexed having been omitted, good faith requires that it should be supplied by construction, since it must be concluded that the parties intended to waive it. A construction has been given to the stipulation by the usage of the two countries, which is sufficient for all practical purposes. What good purpose would be answered by inserting the name of the owner? The court could not inquire even whether such a person existed, much less as to his national character or domicile. The conclusive effect attributed to the passport would prevent any such extrinsic investigation, and therefore a fictitious name might be inserted which would satisfy all the requisites of the treaty. So that a general certificate of the national character of the property is as efficacious as would be a certificate that it was the property of some particular person.

The cause was again argued, upon the application of the executive government to the court, on the question of the construction of the Spanish treaty, and the form and effect of the passports.

51* Mr. Pinkney, for the captors and respondents, stated four points for the consideration of the court:

1st. That the passport produced in this case, was not within the terms of the treaty, because it was obtained by fraud.

2d. That it was not within the treaty, because not issued by the Spanish sovereign, or his known authorized substitute.

3d. That it was not within the same, because the only article which professes to provide for it is incomplete and inofficious, the form never having been annexed, according to the terms of the article.

4th. Because the passport issued for this ship is not conformable either with the terms or the substance of the article; since it does not state that the ship is the property of a Spanish subject, nor name any Spanish subject as the owner.

Wheat. 6.

This treaty is, unquestionably, to be interpreted by a just regard to the public faith, but only so far as the public faith is actually pledged by it. The spirit which animated the parties to the armed neutrality is to be regarded; but it must be remembered that the celebrated confederacy which has received that name was intended to introduce new rules, to the disparagement and repeal of those which then existed, and in derogation of the ancient law of nations. The intention of the parties to the Spanish treaty is also to be taken into view. But this intention is to be collected from the language they have used; if that be clear and plain, there is no room for interpretation; but, if ambiguous in itself, then the intention may be fairly collected from the *object and [52] circumstances of the stipulation in question. In a word, the treaty is to be executed as it is, and no new treaty to be made by the labor of exposition.

1. The object of the stipulation is expressed in the article to be "the ships and vessels belonging to the subjects or people of the other party," &c. This necessarily excludes all other ships or vessels. Consequently, it cannot be applied to vessels which are not really those of Spanish subjects, but only fraudulently represented to be such. It is a principle, not only of the common law, but of universal jurisprudence, that fraud vitiates every act, whether public or private; contracts, deeds, and judgments, are all affected by it, even as to bona fide purchasers. No record, however solemn, estops an allegation of fraud. Judgments of courts of competent jurisdiction import absolute verity, wherever they are brought in question; but if obtained by fraud, they are set aside, either in the same or any other tribunal; and a person affected by the fraud may show it and avoid the judgment, though not a party to the suit. Thus a stranger may avoid a recovery in a real action, if covenous or fraudulent, and he is prejudiced by it. These analogies of the municipal law are applicable to similar cases arising under the law of nations. The comity which is due to foreign states, does not require us to respect the acts of their administrative or judicial officers when they are contaminated with fraud, and still less where this fraud has deceived those very officers, and induced them to issue Spanish papers to a British *ship. [53] In such a case, even if a royal passport had been issued, we should have a right to say, in the language of the common law, "the king has been deceived in his grant." A repetition of such transactions as the present case discloses, would bring the entire treaty into jeopardy. The honor and interest of both nations equally require that they should be repressed. The only mode of preserving the amicable relations between the two powers, is by judicial interposition, preventing the effect of such violations of the spirit of the treaty before they grow too mighty to be controlled by diplomatic remonstrance. Make these frauds successful, and encourage them by your decisions, and such violations will be frequent. On the other hand, by arresting them in limine, the presumed and declared purposes of the contracting parties will be fulfilled, and dissensions and hostilities prevented. That there must be some implied exceptions to the conclusive effect attributed to the passport by the letter of the treaty, is manifest. Such would be the case of a royal passport, signed in blank, obtained by corruption of the officer in whose custody it was, and filled up fraudulently, and applied to a vessel not entitled to the privilege. Here is a passport de facto, with all the solemnities upon its face, yet certainly examinable in this particular; and if shown by extrinsic evidence to be thus fraudulently obtained and used, not only would the captors be excused from costs and damages for detaining the vessel, but she must be condemned under the ordinary rules of prize law. So that all the mischiefs of stopping vessels at sea 54*] may arise *notwithstanding this stipulation; and, indeed, all such attempts to limit the range of maritime warfare will be found in practice to be quite illusory, unless, indeed, the capture of private property be entirely prohibited; and even then contraband and breach of blockade must be excepted. A passport, as in the present case, actually filled up by the proper authority, and intended for the ship for which it is actually used, if issued upon false suggestions, is no more a legal passport than the one just supposed. The will of the grantor does not concur. The fraud makes it no passport. But it is objected, that by the 18th article, the passport, if in due form, is to be conclusive when shown at sea, and the belligerent cannot detain the vessel after this document is exhibited. If the precise letter of the treaty be adhered to, this objection will be found to be groundless. "If the ships of the said subjects, &c., shall be met with," &c., "the master or commander of such ship shall exhibit his passports concerning the property of the ship, made out according to the form inserted in this present treaty." &c. Suppose a ship exhibiting such a passport, should be proved by other evidence found on board, not to be a "ship of the said subjects;" then the letter of the treaty does not apply to her. If not a "ship of the said subjects," her passport is no absolute and conclusive protection. On the other hand, if the spirit of the treaty be regarded, the result is precisely the same. The intention of the contracting parties was to protect Spanish ships, and not enemy ships; to give effect to the 55*] *maxim of free ships, free goods; not to make enemy ships protect enemy goods. Even admitting, that the contracting parties meant to confide in the good faith of each other, that they would grant their respective passports only to their own vessels; still it is not to be supposed, that they meant to confide in the good faith of their enemies, that these last would not attempt to deceive their officers. It would, indeed, be an imputation on their good faith, to suppose that they wished such frauds to be successful. Every such national stipulation must receive a fair and reasonable construction. One which subverts its object, which encourages fraud and perjury, and makes the stipulation destructive to the rights of both parties, and benefits their enemies only, cannot be just. So pernicious a construction destroys all the advantages of the treaty. Look at its consequences to our belligerent rights. The passport, however obtained, and attended with whatever concomitant proof of fraud and falsehood, is supposed to be incontrovertible. However clumsy and barefaced the imposition may be, still it must prevail; and while our enemy is warring upon us in all directions, and by every means, we must suffer his trade to pass unmoled in his own ships, wearing a Spanish veil which disguises nothing, and only compels us to affect blindness. On the other side, the evils flowing from the interpretation we insist upon amount to nothing. The passport is still protecting evidence to all reasonable and honest purposes. The captor who disregards it, does so at the *peril of exemplary costs and [*56 damages, to be inflicted in the discretion of the court, according to the peculiar circumstances of every case. There is, then, the moral restraint of a great responsibility. It is sufficient to give protection where it is due, and was intended to be given. It provides for the consequences of slavish submission to the letter of the instrument on the one hand, and guards against vexatious interruptions of neutral commerce on the other.

2. But, if the document can be issued by any inferior functionary, the argument on the first point is entitled to still more weight. It is impossible to conceive that any nation would be so unwise as to consent that subordinate officers, at a distance from the sovereign authority, of great facility, surrounded by corrupt agents, or perhaps themselves corrupt, should grant such an omnipotent document, sacred, infallible, and conclusive even against the manifest fact and truth. Where is the authority of this court to countenance the issuing of such a document, by an authority less than the highest? The treaty is here silent. If the form had been annexed, it would probably have provision on this subject also. If this omission is to be supplied by construction, the court will remember the high dignity and vast power of the document, and will not too easily confide in the responsibility of subordinate agents, remote from the control of their sovereign. The passport now in question, professes to be issued "for want of royal passports." But why want them? Their absence proves a want of confidence in the *officer who has here assumed the [*57 authority to substitute his own, for the passport of his prince. In the absence of any evidence of a right to exercise an authority so high, or of the fact that any royal passports had ever been entrusted to his distribution, the court cannot recognize the validity of a document thus issued.

3. The 17th and 18th articles of the treaty, so far as they provide for the form and effect of passports, are inofficious and incomplete, for want of the annexation of the form intended. The 17th provides, that the "passport shall be made out, and granted according to the form annexed to this treaty." The ships of the two nations are to be "provided, with passports as above mentioned," &c., "without which requisites they may be sent to one of the ports," &c. The 18th, stipulates that the master "shall exhibit his passports, concerning the property of the ship, made out according to the form inserted in this present treaty, and the ship, when she shall have showed such passport, shall be free, and at liberty to pursue her voyage," &c. So that there is nothing in these articles which gives a conclusive effect to any other passport than one, which it is impossible to have under the treaty, as the parties have left it. The first part of the 17th article does indeed give some of the qualities of the passport; but it must have others, and they are unattainable by reason of the omission of the form. The court then must either strike out the reference to a form, or imagine a form, and annex it. To do either, would be a high act of legislation, to 58* which the court is *incompetent. But let us try to discover the form; and taking the 17th article for a guide, it must express the name, property, and bulk of the ship, and the name and habitation of the master. Still there are several things more to be ascertained. Who is authorized to grant the passport? This is an essential circumstance; is ascertained by the forms of passport annexed to several treaties; and would probably have been expressed in this form had it been annexed. How is the proprietary interest to be stated: as the general property of the subjects of the state, or as the special property of some individual named? Is the national character of the ship, as a part of the navigation of the country under whose flag she sails, sufficient; or must it appear to be the property of subjects in general, or of some individual owner? Under what sanctions and solemnities, and accompanied by what proofs, is the document to issue? These, too, are regulated by the forms annexed to several treaties, which were brought to the notice of the court, at the former argument. The court may supply these requisites, conjecturally, but it can have no assurance that it will not err, and defeat, instead of promoting the intention of the parties. The stipulations of the treaty are nothing, and profess to be nothing without the form of passport. The contracting parties have made no effectual contract on this matter, without the form. The court cannot finish, what they have left imperfect, any more than it could frame new articles, and insert them in the treaty. The contracting parties give conclusiveness 59* to no passport *but one according to a form to be annexed. The court knows not what that form would have been. It might have explained, varied, or added to the requisites of the passport contained in the body of the treaty. Can the court give conclusive effect to any other passport than the one intended to be provided by the treaty? If it can, the treaty would, to a certain extent, be made by the court. But the judiciary has no portion of the treaty-making power under our constitution; and cannot exercise it under the pretext of interpreting treaties made by the President and Senate. Here is no room for interpretation. The language of the treaty is express and intelligible, as far as it goes. It creates but one casus fœderis. The court cannot vary it, or superadd another. The 14th article of the Prussian treaty of 1785, contains a similar stipulation with that of the Spanish treaty. The passport is to express the "name, property, and burden of the vessel, as also the name and habitation of the master, which passports shall be made out in good and due forms (to be settled by conventions between the parties, whenever occasion shall require"), &c. Suppose that no such conventions were ever concluded (and in fact they never were), could the court supply the form, or give effect to the stipulation in the treaty with Prussia? Yet the two cases are the same: for the omission of a convention settling the form, or of the annexation of the form, equally fail to complete the stipulation. If one can be judicially supplied, why cannot the other? It is a gratuitous assumption to say, that by the non-annexation, the *parties intended to refer the form to [*60 each other's good faith and discretion. If they had changed their minds in this respect, when they executed the treaty, a supplemental article would have been added; and the only fair inference from their silence is, that they meant to leave the stipulation of free ships, free goods, to support itself by the ordinary rules of evidence as to the property of the ship. The court cannot alter the treaty by mere implication, and that, too, not a necessary implication, for the non-annexation might have been the result of inadvertence. It might also have been the result of an intention to abandon the scheme of conclusive passports, or of passports more than usually efficacious, by omitting to perfect the treaty in that respect. If the defect proceeded from accident, the parties might have supplied it by a subsequent convention: and if they have not thought fit to do it, the proper inference is, that they did not wish to do it; and if wishing it, they have neglected it, they have no reason to complain that the court acts upon the treaty as it finds it. The inadvertence, therefore, was remediable in a regular manner, by the treaty-making power on both sides; and the court has no right to say that it was not an inadvertence; or if by design, that it was not intended to leave the stipulation abortive as to the effect of passports. And where is the mighty mischief of leaving it unaccomplished? The great object of the treaty was the principle of free ships, free goods. Take away the conclusiveness of the passport, and that principle remains in full force. It stands in many a treaty without it. The passport would still *have its proper [*61 effect. It would be entitled to respect as prima facie evidence, but it would not be conclusive against further examination. No doubt the public faith is to be preserved but the care of it is devolved upon this court to a limited extent only; the executive government is answerable for the rest. The jurisdiction of the court to carry the treaty into effect, arises out of the constitution, which declares it to be the supreme law of the land, and it is only as a law that the court can deal with it. Where a treaty gives a legal rule, the court may enforce it directly in the exercise of its ordinary and regular jurisdiction. But where it fails to give such a rule, the court is without power. As a court of the law of nations, it cannot, by analogy to its equitable jurisdiction, supply the defective execution of a treaty, as chancery supplies the defective execution of a power, or a trust. A court of equity supplies a remedy where there is a right merely equitable. It has a control over the parties to compel them to do justice, although there be no legal obligation. But this court cannot deal with treaties in this manner. It must execute them as it finds them, since it acts upon them as written laws merely, and has no control over the parties to make them conform their conventions to their actual intentions. Suppose the United States had refused to make a convention providing the form of passports under the Prussian treaty, could this court compel the government to do it, or consider it to be done, because in equity it ought to be done? An equitable jurisdiction over treaties, implies a control over parties. But 62*] the *power of the court over treaties is incidental merely; it makes the treaty act where it professes to act, and does not supply rules of conduct which the treaty does not give. Its province is interpretative, as in the case of other laws; and it can no more assume the treaty-making power, than any other legislative power.

4. But putting the last objection out of the question, the passport produced does not conform to the 17th article of the Spanish treaty. The requisition of the treaty is, that the passport shall state "the name, property and bulk of the ship," &c., "that it may appear thereby that the ship really and truly belongs to the subjects of one of the parties," &c. But this passport merely licenses the master, by name, "to proceed in his Spanish ship," &c. How does it appear by this that the ship is the property of any subject of Spain? The words of the treaty, or absolute synonyms, are essential, and cannot be dispensed with without frustrating the object of the stipulation. Unless, therefore, the substituted words necessarily, and under all circumstances, mean the same thing, and give the same security to the belligerent, the departure is fatal. The pronoun "his," as here used, does not relate to property, but to the official character of the master; nor is it pretended that he is owner. The words "Spanish ship," do not necessarily denote Spanish property. Spain may adopt, or naturalize foreign vessels, for temporary, or for permanent purposes, without making their owners her subjects. Even a Spanish passport given to a vessel, documented in other respects as a foreign vessel, may be held to communicate the Spanish national character. It depends on Spain to make any vessels Spanish vessels, and thus to give the protection of her flag and pass to the whole navigation of our enemy. The words here substituted, do not then necessarily import the same with the words of the treaty; they are susceptible of evasion; they may be true, and yet the requisitions of the treaty remain unsatisfied.

Mr. Harper, contra, referred to the former argument on the part of the claimant and appellant on all the points, except that relative to the omission of the form of passport provided by the treaty, which he insisted did not defeat the conclusive effect meant to be attributed to the passport by the treaty. The construction contended for, on the part of the captors, would destroy the benevolent object of the contracting parties. It is highly improbable that the two nations would have suffered so important an alteration to be worked in their original intentions, either by an accidental or designed omission of the form of passport. The annexation could hardly have been omitted from negligence; and if the entire effect of the stipulation was meant to have been waived, the parties would have distinctly expressed this change in their views. The fair inference, therefore, is, that they meant to refer the form to each other's good faith, and to be satisfied if it contained a compliance with the substantial requisitions of the treaty. Under this confidence, our vessels have been furnished with the sea-letter, and the vessels of Spain with a royal passport, or a passport substituted *for it by the Spanish [64 authorities, to whom the issuing of royal passports is entrusted, and containing the same particulars as to the property of the ship, &c., which the royal passport contains. It is not contended, that the passport may be issued by any Spanish authority, however inferior, or however alien his functions to the matter in question; but only by such officers as the Spanish government authorizes to grant them. If, notwithstanding a vessel has such a passport or sea-letter on board, she is liable to be interrupted in her voyage, and carried in for adjudication, under the ordinary rules of the prize-court, independent of the conventional law, the object of the contracting parties will be entirely defeated. It is true, that free ships will still make free goods; but if the freedom of the ship must be established by the tedious process of judicial investigation, notwithstanding the provisions of the treaty intended to exclude such investigation, very little will be gained for the security of neutral commerce. The terms used in the passport, with which the ship was furnished, are precisely synonymous with those of the treaty. The treaty does not say, that the passport shall express the individual proprietary interest of any particular Spanish subject, but that it shall express the property of the ship. How can a ship be a "Spanish ship" without being Spanish property? And how can it be Spanish property without being the property of the subjects of Spain? This is the effect of the terms, as used in a policy of insurance, and other commercial transactions. A mere license to a foreign ship, *docu- [65 mented as a foreign ship, conferring on her the privileges of Spanish trade, by a fictitious adoption similar to that which gave rise to the British rule of 1756, relative to the colonial trade, would not make her a Spanish ship. And even if Spain should abuse the immunity conferred by the treaty, it is no reason why this court should dispense with its obligations. It is for the legislative authority to determine when political considerations will justify this country in suspending any of the provisions of a foreign treaty. The court must take the law from the treaty-making power, or from the higher legislative power dispensing with the obligations of a treaty.

The cause was continued to the next term for advisement.

At the present term the opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice STORY: This cause was heard upon the whole evidence, introduced by both parties, at the last term; and as it embraced several points of great importance and difficulty, the court ex mero motu, directed one of those points to be re-argued; and another, including a final construction of the Spanish treaty in matters of deep and universal interest, was re-argued upon the application of the government itself. The last argument was heard at so late a period of the session, that it was found impracticable for all of us to prepare deliberate opinions, and the cause was ordered by the court to be *continued for advisement. The court [66 has now come to a result, which I am directed to pronounce.

A preliminary question was raised at the original argument, that the libel ought to be dismissed, because the capture was made without public authority, and by a non-commissioned vessel. Whether this be so or not, we do not think it material now to inquire. It is a question between the government and the captors, with which the claimant has nothing to do. If the ship and cargo be enemy's property, it cannot be restored to the claimant. If the captors made the capture without any legal commission, and it is decreed good prize, the condemnation must, under such circumstances, be to the government itself. If with a commission, then it may be to the captors. But in any view, the question is matter of subsequent inquiry after the principal question of prize is disposed of; and the government may, if it chooses, contest the right of the captors by an interlocutory application after a decree of condemnation has passed, and before distribution is decreed. The claimant can have no just interest in that question, and cannot be permitted to moot it before this court.

Having disposed of this point, which, indeed, has been long recognized as a settled principle of the law of prize, the path is open for the consideration of the other points of the cause.

The captors contend, that the whole evidence establishes, that the ship and cargo are enemies' property, the property of British subjects disguised under Spanish documents, and bound 67* to a British port. *That the voyage had its origin in London, and was to terminate there; and that the usual frauds of false papers, false destination, and suppression of evidence, have been resorted to for the purpose of giving a neutral character to hostile interests.

The counsel for the claimant deny the matter of fact, and assert, that the proprietary interest of ship and cargo is bona fide Spanish; and endeavor, with great ingenuity and force, to explain away the difficulties with which it is admitted, on all sides, this part of the cause is surrounded. If this ground should be thought not to be entirely and satisfactorily made out, the counsel for the claimant further contend, that the ship was duly documented as a Spanish ship, according to the stipulations of the Spanish treaty of 1795; and that the effect of those stipulations is to preclude all inquiry into the proprietary interest of ship and cargo. Of the former, because the passport is conclusive evidence of the national character and ownership of the ship, which all persons are estopped to deny; of the latter, because, by the treaty, free ships make free goods, and the national character of the cargo becomes wholly immaterial.

To this point, which, if settled one way, is decisive of the cause, the counsel for the captors have given several answers: 1. That the passport of this ship was obtained by fraud, and this is always inquirable into, and vitiates all, even the most sacred instruments and records. 2. That the passport is not conformable to the treaty, not having been issued by royal authority, or authenticated by the royal government, 68* but issued by a mere colonial governor; and that, such as it is, it does not state the ship to be owned by Spanish subjects, which is indispensable under the treaty. 3. That the substituted proof required by the 17th article of the treaty, where the passport is not regular, must be such as is subject to the thorough examination of the prize court. 4. That the form of the passport, referred to in the 17th article of the treaty, never having been annexed to it by the contracting parties, that article, so far as it purports to give any effect to passports, is inoperative and imperfect, and the imperfection cannot be supplied by any judicial tribunal.

Such are the leading propositions, pressed with great ability and earnestness into the discussion of this cause, by the respective parties. They embrace principles of international law of vast importance; they embrace private interests of no inconsiderable magnitude; and they embrace the interpretation of a treaty which we are bound to observe with the most scrupulous good faith, and which our government could not violate without disgrace, and which this court could not disregard without betraying its duty. It need not be said, therefore, that we feel the responsibility of our stations on this occasion, and that in delivering our opinion to the world, we have pondered on it with great solicitude and deliberation, and have looked to consequences no further than the sound principles of interpretation and international justice required us to look.

The point to which the court will first direct its attention, is that last made, viz., whether the 17th article of the treaty of 1795, [69 so far as it respects passports, is inoperative and imperfect in consequence of the omission to annex the form of the passport to the treaty. This is a very delicate and interesting question.

The 17th article provides, "that in case either of the parties hereto shall be engaged in a war, the ships and vessels belonging to the subjects or people of the other party, must be furnished with sea-letters or passports (patentes de mar o pasaportes), expressing the name, property (propiedad), and bulk of the ship; as, also, the name and place of habitation of the master or commander of the said ship, that it may appear thereby, that the ship really and truly belongs to the subject of one of the parties, which passports (dichos pasaportes) shall be made out and granted according to the form annexed to this treaty." The article proceeds to declare, "that such ships, being laden, are to be provided not only with passports, as above mentioned, but also with certificates containing the several particulars of the cargo, the place whence the ship sailed, that so it may be known whether any forbidden or contraband goods be on board the same; which certificates shall be made out by the officers of the place whence the ship sailed, in the accustomed form; and if anyone shall think it fit or advisable to express in the said certificate, the person to whom the goods on board belong, he may freely do so; without which requisites they may be sent to one of the ports of the other contracting party, and adjudged *by the competent tribunal, according to what is above set forth, that all the circumstances of the above omission, having been well examined, they shall be adjudged to be legal prizes, unless they shall give legal satisfaction of their property by testimony entirely equivalent." In point of fact, no form of a passport was made out and annexed to the treaty. The case, then, now before us, is not within the letter of the treaty, for as no form is prescribed, the documents found on board cannot be compared with any form; and until that comparison is made, it is impossible to say whether the stipulations originally intended by the treaty have been exactly and literally complied with or not. There is no room here left for interpretation, on account of ambiguous language of the parties. They have expressed themselves in the clearest manner, and it is to the passport, whose form is to be annexed to the treaty, and to none other, that the effect intended by the treaty, whatever that may be, either as conclusive or prima facie evidence of proprietary interest, is attributed. Into the reasons why this form was omitted to be annexed to the treaty, we are not permitted judicially to inquire. It may have been by accident, or by design, from difference of opinion as to what should be the solemnities accompanying it, or from a willingness to leave it to future negotiation. Can this court annex a form to the treaty? Can it supply the deficiency of the treaty, and give effect to it in the same manner as if no form were referred to? Can it look to the stipulations, and decide for itself what the parties regarded as substance, 71*] and what as mere form? *Can it say that the stipulations in the text would have been agreed to without the auxiliary form of the passport? Can it decide judicially, that under no circumstances the form of the passport could be of the essence of the stipulations? These are grave questions, and are not to be lightly answered. They deserve and require deliberate consideration. We have given it; and our opinion will now be delivered.

In the first place, this court does not possess any treaty-making power. That power belongs by the constitution to another department of the government; and to alter, amend, or add to any treaty, by inserting any clause, whether small or great, important or trivial, would be on our part an usurpation of power, and not an exercise of judicial functions. It would be to make, and not to construe a treaty. Neither can this court supply a casus omissus in a treaty, any more than in a law. We are to find out the intention of the parties by just rules of interpretation applied to the subject-matter; and having found that, our duty is to follow it as far as it goes, and to stop where that stops—whatever may be the imperfections or difficulties which it leaves behind. The parties who formed this treaty, and they alone, have a right to annex the form of the passport. It is a high act of sovereignty, as high as the formation of any other stipulation of the treaty. It is a matter of negotiation between the governments. The treaty does not leave it to the discretion of either party to annex the form of the passport; it requires it to be the joint act of both; and 72*] that act *is to be expressed by both parties in the only manner known between independent nations—by a solemn compact through agents specially delegated, and by a formal ratification.

Nor is there anything strange or singular in leaving matters of this sort to be settled by future negotiations. In our treaty with Prussia of 1785, the 14th article contains a provision as to passports, in substance like that of the 17th article of our treaty with Spain, except that it declares that these “passports shall be made out in good and due form, to be settled by conventions between the parties, whenever occasion shall require.” This stipulation manifestly contemplates that the form of the passport is to be a solemn act of the treaty-making power of both governments, and that neither government has authority in its discretion to use a form which shall be binding, without its consent, upon the other contracting party.

In the next place, this court is bound to give effect to the stipulations of the treaty in the manner and to the extent which the parties have declared, and not otherwise. We are not at liberty to dispense with any of the conditions or requirements of the treaty, or to take away any qualification or integral part of any stipulation, upon any notion of equity or general convenience, or substantial justice. The terms which the parties have chosen to fix, the forms which they have prescribed, and the circumstances under which they are to have operation, rest in the exclusive discretion of the contracting parties, and whether they belong to the essence or the model *parts of the [*73 treaty, equally give the rule to judicial tribunals. The same powers which have contracted, are alone competent to change or dispense with any formality. The doctrine of a performance cy pres, so just and appropriate in the civil concerns of private persons, belongs not to the solemn compacts of nations, so far as judicial tribunals are called upon to interpret or enforce them. We can as little dispense with forms as with substance.

In the next place, we cannot admit that the annexation of the form of the passport was, in itself (supposing we had a right to inquire into it), a matter of small moment or importance, so that the omission could be dispensed with, as not belonging to the substance of the treaty. It was competent to the parties, by the particularity of the form, to have qualified the general expressions of the article, and to have made that determinate, which, upon the face of the article, stands indeterminate. It is, for instance, indeterminate upon the face of the article, whether there is to be a specification of the names of the owners of the ship, or only a general declaration that the owners are Americans or Spaniards. It has also been contended here, and is certainly susceptible of doubt, whether the passport was to express the individual ownership, or the national character of the ship. So the solemnities to be observed in granting the passport, the oaths to be made by the parties, the persons by whom they were to be verified, are all left indeterminate by the treaty. These might have been, and looking to the requisitions of other treaties, must have been explained and settled by the form annexed *to this treaty. The 25th article of the [*74 Dutch treaty of 1782, is substantially the same as the 17th article of the Spanish treaty; and the form of the passport, certificate, and sea-letter annexed to that treaty, reduce to a perfect certainty every circumstance which has been already mentioned. Other qualifications and limitations might have been added, in the pleasure of the parties. It is impossible, therefore, for this court, judicially, to say what such passport might or would have contained. We may indeed conjecture, but in this conjecture we may err; and to assert what it would be in literis, would be to exercise a sovereign control over the compact itself.

Nor are the circumstances already stated, mere form, or diplomatic ceremony. They might well have entered into the very substance of the stipulation. The counsel for the claimant alleges, that the passport, intended by the treaty, was to import perfect, unimpeachable verity; that it was to have a sanctity beyond that which is granted to any other solemn instrument. Fraud would not vitiate it, nor the most direct, unequivocal breach of good faith, or abuse of the passport, bring its protecting virtue into question. Assuming, for the purpose of argument, that this is true, the form of the passport, and the solemnities accompanying it, were of the deepest interest and importance to both nations. It was vital to the treaty; vital to the acknowledged rights derived under the law of nations. The immunity intended by the treaty, in this view of it, was a derogation from the general belligerent rights of both parties. They might be willing to concede 75* the issuing of such passports to the Spanish high officers of state with the royal approbation and signature, or with the corresponding signatures of our own Secretary of State and President. They might have full faith and confidence, that under such guards, the danger of abuses would be very much diminished, if not entirely checked. But they might not be willing to trust to the integrity, discretion, and watchfulness of subordinate agents; to officers of the customs; to colonial governors, or commanders in distant provinces. In point of fact, our own passports have issued under the authority and signatures of our highest executive officers. What reason has this court to presume that our government would accept of a verification by inferior officers of Spain? What reason has this court to presume that our government would have been satisfied with a passport signed by a colonial governor for want of royal passports? It has not been so stipulated in the treaty. It has not, in terms, dispensed with the annexation of the form of the passport to the treaty. Even if one government had been willing to dispense with it, it remains to be shown, that the other was also willing. And if both were willing, it would still remain to be shown that the act of dispensation was consummated by a solemn renunciation; for the obligations of the treaty could not be changed or varied but by the same formalities with which they were introduced; or at least by some act of as high an import, and of as unequivocal an authority. All that can be said in the present case, is, that the subject of the annexation of the passport was 76* taken ad referendum by the parties. They had competent authority so to do; and this court is bound to presume, that they had good reasons for their conduct. It is far more consistent with every fair interpretation of the acts of the government, to suppose, that the form of the passport was postponed with a view to the suspension of the article until the subject was more deliberately considered, or could be more conveniently attended to, than to suppose that words of reference were used without meaning, and forms carrying with them such important and interesting solemnities, and such obligatory force and dignity, were hastily abandoned at the very moment they were studiously sealed to the text. Unless this court is prepared to say, that all forms and solemnities were useless and immaterial; that neither government had a right to insist upon a form after having assented to the terms of the article; that a judicial tribunal may dispense with what its own notions of equity may deem unimportant in a treaty, though the parties have chosen to require it; it cannot consider the 17th article of this treaty as complete or operative, until the form of the passport is incorporated into it by the joint act of both governments.

Upon the whole, it is the opinion of the court, in which opinion six judges agree, that the form of the passport not having been annexed to the 17th article of the treaty, the immunity, whatever it was, intended by that article, never took effect; and therefore, in examining and deciding on the case before us, we must be governed by the general law of prize.

*This view of the case renders it unnecessary to consider the other points made by the counsel for the captors, as to the effect of the treaty; and we therefore give no opinion upon them.

It remains, then, to consider whether the ship and cargo, now in judgment, are, in fact, neutral or hostile property. The facts are extremely complicated, and the evidence, in many instances, clashes so as to forbid all hopes of reconciling it. It cannot be disguised, too, that the claim is involved in much perplexity, and is shaded by some circumstances that have not been entirely cleared away. If it were not a task from which we could derive no general instruction, the whole evidence might be minutely examined, as to the questions of false destination, suppression of papers, and use of false papers. But the labor would be very great, and after all, would conduce to no important purpose. We shall content ourselves, therefore, with a brief statement of the result of our opinion.

It is to be recollected, that by the settled rule of prize courts, the onus probandi of a neutral interest rests on the claimant. This rule is tempered by another, whose liberality will not be denied—that the evidence to acquit or condemn, shall, in the first instance, come from the ship's papers, and persons on board; and where these are not satisfactory, if the claimant has not violated good faith, he shall be admitted to maintain his claim by further proof. But if, in the event, after full time and opportunity to adduce proofs, the claim is still left in uncertainty, and the neutrality of the property is not established beyond reasonable 78 doubt, it is the invariable rule of prize courts to reject the claim, and to decree condemnation of the property. There is another rule, too, founded in the most salutary and benign principles of justice—that the assertion of a false claim, in whole or in part, by an agent of, or in connivance with the real owners, is a substantive cause of forfeiture, leading to condemnation of the property. These principles are not alluded to in this case, for the purpose of founding our present judgment upon them; for we do not rely upon it as a case merely of reasonable doubt; but to show that a case less strong might justly have supported the decree we feel ourselves bound to pronounce—of condemnation.

We cannot resist the conclusion, looking to the whole evidence, that this is a case where the whole mercantile adventure had its origin, in the house of trade of Messrs. Von Harten & Gobel, a house domiciled in London. The ship was, beyond all question, a foreign ship; but of what nation, and in whose ownership at the time when she acquired her ostensible Spanish character, is studiously concealed. She came just before her naturalization from New Providence; and that naturalization was procured, as we feel ourselves constrained to believe, by an imposition practiced upon the Spanish judicial authorities, by means of a pretended lien under a bottomry bond, supposed to be given for repairs. The holder of the bond procured a judicial sale of the vessel, became himself the purchaser, and afterwards obtained the Spanish character by a negotiation with 79* the Spanish colonial government, *making awkward apologies for his asserted ignorance of the former ownership, and endeavoring to allay the well-founded distrust of that government. To this very hour the claimant has observed a profound silence on this point, a source of just and pregnant suspicion, although he has loaded the cause with documentary proofs and affidavits on other points. He has not chosen to give any information as to the origin of the bottomry bond, or former ownership of the vessel, or of the circumstances under which the supposed lien was acquired. Yet these facts would seem to have lain immediately within his reach. On board, too, of the vessel at the time of the capture, was the special and confidential agent of Messrs. Von Harten & Gobel, and also the brother-in-law of Mr. Von Harten. Some papers were thrown overboard, others were concealed, and others spoliated. The testimony of the witnesses upon the standing interrogatories, was far from satisfactory; and it is extremely difficult to exempt the agents on board the vessel from the imputation of designed suppression of facts and prevarication. The claimant, Mr. Munos, is the father-in-law of Mr. Gobel, and claims this very valuable shipment as his own property, asserting himself to be a merchant now engaged in business. And yet it is proved by a weight of testimony that seems difficult to resist, that Mr. Munos has not been known to be engaged in commercial business on his own account for at least fifteen years before the time of this shipment. And it is established in the most satisfactory manner, and is indeed admitted by the 80* claimant himself, *that on account of the foreign character of Mr. Gobel (the son-in-law of Mr. Munos), all the foreign business of Mr. Gobel has been constantly carried on for several years under the cover of Mr. Munos. These are a few of the extraordinary facts of this case, and combining them with the indications of the papers found on board, and the suppressed documents which have reached the light; the vehement presumption, and almost written proof, that Mr. Gobel, the admitted partner of the English house of Von Harten & Gobel, was the stationed agent of that house at Havana; and the fact, that the destination was alternative, or double, to London or Hamburg, or both; the conclusion is difficult to overcome, that the cargo was the property of Messrs. Von Harten & Gobel, or some other unknown enemy proprietor, and covered by the Spanish character of Mr. Munos. And the court is constrained to consider the proceeding at Havana as mere machinery to neutralize an enemy's ship, and that the ship, either previously belonged to Messrs. Von Harten & Gobel, or some other enemy proprietor, or was purchased at New Providence on his or their account. It is perfectly immaterial whether Mr. Munos had any subordinate interest in the ship and cargo or not. If his claim be substantially false in the manner in which it is framed, having been adopted by him, he has justly incurred a forfeiture of any such interest, by attempting an imposition upon the prize court.

It is the judgment of the court, that the decree of the Circuit Court, condemning the ship and cargo, *be affirmed, with costs. From [*81 so much of this opinion as respects the question of proprietary interest of vessel and cargo, three judges dissent.

Mr. Justice JOHNSON. This is an appeal from the sentence of the Circuit Court of North Carolina, condemning this vessel and cargo as prize of war to the Roger, privateer.

The condemnation below appears to have proceeded on evidence of an hostile interest existing in the ship. For, as to the cargo, it is not denied that the proprietary interest is immaterial; since, if the ship be Spanish, the existence of an enemy interest in the cargo, does not affect it. Yet, much of the evidence and argument have been introduced to prove the existence of an hostile interest in the cargo; but it has been with a view to maintain two positions: 1st. That it is a strong circumstance to prove the vessel to be British property; and, 2d. That, though it be not enemy owned, yet, as both vessel and cargo are claimed by the neutral, if it be proved that he has attempted a fraud, the penal consequence is the forfeiture of his own interest.

It cannot be denied, that there are many circumstances in the case, going strongly to prove too intimate a connection, between this adventure, and the mercantile transactions of the house of Gobel, consisting of Gobel and Von Harten, a British merchant. Nor is it entirely clear that Rahlives, who appears in the machinery as supercargo, is not himself a participator in interest. If I felt myself now called upon to decide this case on the ordinary principles *which govern the decisions of [*82 prize courts on neutral claims, it must be acknowledged that there is a good deal of evidence which must be rejected, in order to clear it from the tissue of difficulties in which the circumstances involve it. Yet there is one important consideration which rides over all the unaccountable combinations of interest which present themselves to the view of the court. Why should British property on board a Spanish vessel have been disguised as Spanish? There are obvious reasons why Spanish property should have been disguised as British; for, it would have afforded protection against the only enemy a Spaniard had to fear—the patriot privateer. But, as England was at peace with all the world except America, and enemy property secure from American capture in a Spanish vessel, it is difficult to conceive a reason why this disguise should have been thrown over a British cargo. The course, however, which I will pursue in coming to a conclusion, precludes the necessity of disentangling the web, in which the interests of the claimant are wound up by the various circumstances of the destruction, mutilation, and concealment of papers, and the questionable shape in which several of the actors in the drama present themselves to the view of this court.

The claimant finds his right to restitution on his Spanish character, and the sufficiency of his Spanish documents under the treaty. The captor contends, that the documents found on board, were not of the first order under the 83* treaty, and that when let in to *the production of substitutes, a plenary inquiry is opened in to proprietary interest.

Before entering upon these more general questions, it is necessary to take notice of a preliminary ground of condemnation, which, if it can be sustained, anticipates every other inquiry. It appears that the vessel left the Havana under convoy of a British frigate, and, it is contended that this circumstance is, per se, a ground of condemnation.

This is, at least, a new ground in this court; and it cannot be expected that it will meet with a very favorable admission from a court which has manifested no disposition to multiply causes of condemnation. Without being supposed to express any inclination to adopt the principle, I deem it sufficient to remark, that if it could be admitted, it ought not to be applied to a nation which needed that protection against an existing and enterprising enemy; and which ought, therefore, to be considered, as having sought it for that purpose, and not against a neutral, whose principles of conduct it had then no reason to distrust. The Gulf of Florida, at that time, swarmed with patriot privateers; and the convoying ship had, moreover, parted from the fleet before this capture was made. The conduct of this vessel was perfectly pacific when overhauled by the American cruiser. The utmost to which the courts of Great Britain have gone, has been to affect the merchant vessel actually taken under convoy, with the resistance or character of the convoying ship; and when such a case shall occur, it will be time enough for this court to de- 84* termine on the course it *will adopt. At present I feel no inclination to go so much beyond those decisions as has been here contended for.

On the principle question, it appears that this vessel was provided, at the time of her sailing, both with a passport and certificate of her cargo. That these papers were on board at the time of the capture, cannot be doubted; they were both delivered by the captain to the registrar of the District Court, the former marked A. No. 7; the latter, B. No. 1. Some doubt arises whether they were both exhibited prior to the capture; but this is wholly immaterial in the question of condemnation.

In behalf of the claimant it is contended, that on the production of the passport and certificate, or bill of lading of the cargo, he is entitled to restitution. To this the captor objects, that the 17th article of the treaty with Spain, contemplated a form of passport intended to be attached to that treaty; that as no such form was settled by the two nations, the claim must rest altogether upon the provisions of the 15th article, and the proprietary interest is to be inquired into as in ordinary cases. But, if the contracting parties are to be permitted to devise forms of passports for themselves severally, then that this is not a passport in the language of the treaty, but a substitute for one, and is defective in not expressing unequivocally that the ship was Spanish property.

On this part of the case it is proper to remark, that it is not always easy for the criticising eye of the common law to expand to the enlarged views and *remote perceptions which [85 should govern the mind in the construction of treaties. Yet nothing could be more inconsistent with international law, than to apply to such instruments those scrutinizing principles, which enter into the construction of a special plea or a criminal statute. From history, analogy, and policy, as well as language, are to be gathered the views of the contracting parties; and however either may be pressed by the application of conventional stipulations to particular cases, or under particular circumstances, not less is the obligation to execute them in a spirit, not only of good faith, but of liberality. Where no coercive power exists for compelling the observance of contracts but the force of arms, honor and liberality are the only bonds of union between the contracting parties, and all minor considerations are to be sacrificed to the great interests of mankind.

In the case before us, I see no reason for nullifying the operation of the 17th article, for want of the form which was in contemplation to be drawn up and attached to the treaty. The substance of the passport intended to be prescribed, is so copiously exhibited, as to render it a matter of the simplest effort to throw it into form. This, no doubt, was the cause why the contracting parties manifested so much indifference about carrying their intention into effect. I am, therefore, content to give the same effect to any instrument complying substantially with this article, as ought to have been given to a passport in a prescribed form. What is that effect?

*This is easily ascertained by compar- [86 ing the provisions of the 15th, 17th, and 18th articles. By the 15th the principle is established that free ships shall make free goods, and that several branches of commerce which the modern law of nations has prohibited to neutrals, shall, notwithstanding, be freely prosecuted. But, knowing the endless litigation which questions of proprietary interest give rise to, and the sad depravity of morals exhibited by witnesses in prize courts, the enlightened statesmen who formed that treaty, resolved, by the 17th and 18th articles, to make the freedom of the ship to rest upon documentary evidence in the first instance; and evidence of property in those cases only, in which the vessel was unprovided with the necessary documents; that each nation should be sovereign to judge for itself in conferring upon its own vessels the immunity secured by the treaty, and that the acknowledge right of adjudication in the courts of the capturing power, should be superseded, when a vessel was found on the ocean provided with the documentary evidence stipulated for by treaty; and only revert, when the vessel, being unprovided with such documents, was obliged to resort to evidence of property of a less solemn nature.

It is contended, that this is yielding an important national right. What if it is? It is a mutual relinquishment, and one made by the government, not by this court. And although it operate against us now, the time may come when the comity of Spain, or her colonies, may extend the benefits of it to the commerce of 87* this country. But, be that as it may, *if the relinquishment has been made, it is incumbent on us to observe it. And although it may not be so sensibly felt at present, the time is scarce gone by when it was thought a highly beneficial stipulation to this country. Spain was, at the date of that treaty, a respectable naval power. Her relations with Europe and the Barbary powers often involved her in wars. America abounded with ships and seamen, and her prospects were favorable for the enjoyment of peace. To carry on the commerce of the West Indies and Mediterranean, as the favorite carriers of belligerent cargoes, was, therefore, to us, a highly flattering object. And though occasional impositions might be practiced, it was, comparatively, a trivial consideration, and the chances mutual. When abuses should become flagrant and intolerable, it would have presented a just cause for dissolving the treaty; but it does not rest with courts of justice to dissolve a treaty.

As to considerations drawn from the impolicy of discouraging the spirit of cruising, I attach to them very little importance. The most serious doubts may well be entertained of the policy of giving encouragement to that species of enterprise. Certain it is, that no nation can pursue it long without feeling its demoralizing influence. It draws together a race of men, from every quarter, who want for nothing but a legal pretext for indulging their appetite for blood and violence; and while their habits and examples become popular, the rapid fortunes which are occasionally acquired, render the most valuable classes of a community dissatisfied with seeking *competence by the slow progress of useful labor. It will not, perhaps, be too much to say, that this country is, at this time, experiencing something of the baneful effects which flow to the world from letting loose the passions of men to gratify themselves with plunder. But, be this as it may, it is the direct object of these articles, of this treaty, to cover commerce from capture; and if a treaty is to be construed with a view to effectuate its intent, that construction which will afford the most ample protection to commerce, will be most consistent with the views which dictated this treaty. Could the language of the treaty leave a doubt on this subject, it is historically known, that the policy of the United States, at the time of its date, was, if possible, to annihilate the right of cruising against commerce. With many ships, and a most flourishing trade, she had not a vessel of war; and while every other nation was likely to be embroiled in wars, her policy was peace, and her prospects favorable to the enjoyment of it. To become the carriers of the world, was the object to which her negotiations were directed; and could she have obtained the same stipulation from all the rest of the European nations, she must have succeeded greatly.

The example of other nations in the construction of treaties is brought to the notice of this court. But, besides that the analogy in the cases referred to is very remote, I cannot admit the force of any example that contravenes general principles. It is a melancholy truth, that nations and their courts are too often inclined to restrict or enlarge construction, *under a temporizing policy suggested by [*89] the pressure or allurements of present circumstances. I will endeavor to give this treaty the same construction against an American captor, as ought to be given it in the courts of the opposite contracting party. And the day may arrive when American commerce will have no cause to regret that our courts have pursued liberal and enlarged views in adopting this construction.

On the exceptions taken to the form of the passport it is to be observed, that on the face of the instrument it is declared to be issued in default of royal passports. From this circumstance, a doubt arose whether it was an instrument of the highest authority. This led to an inquiry at the highest sources of information relative to the powers of the Governor of Cuba to issue such passports. From the information thus obtained, I am satisfied that his powers are amply sufficient to support the authority of that document. Some very serious doubts also have been raised relative to the form of the instrument, particularly that passage of it which has relation to the national character of the ship. The treaty requires that it should set forth the name, property, and bulk of the ship; also, the name and habitation of the master or commander. These requisites are all minutely complied with, unless we except that part which relates to the property of the vessel. The words used with that view are simply fragata mercante Espanola; and a doubt has existed whether this be a sufficient affirmation of the property or national character of the vessel. Nor has this doubt *been removed without a care-[*90] ful reference to the passports of various nations. The result is, that in all of them the affirmation is general, without specifying the individual proprietor. It is also in evidence that this is the form known and used in Spain and her colonies, as the passport of regularly documented and acknowledged Spanish vessels; and I feel myself bound to receive and acknowledge it as sufficient in form and substance.

Thus far the opinion was written, and prepared to be delivered, prior to the argument ordered at the instance of the executive. I have seen no reason to change a word of it, from anything since heard. On the contrary, the last argument has fully confirmed me in its correctness. Thousands of imaginary cases of fraud and collusion have been suggested to alarm the court; and it may be, that our government, having now a prospect of becoming a respectable naval power, and having experienced the activity and enterprise of our privateers in the late war, may feel less disposed to promote the principles of the armed neutrality, than they did formerly. This conviction of former error has generally grown out of the same change of circumstances in other states. But it is not through the medium of courts of justice that this change of sentiment is to develop itself. If this treaty was ever binding, it is equally binding now; and in adjudicating between individuals, the same rules which would ever have been applicable, ought to be religiously adhered to, under all possible changes of interest or policy.

But the interests and apprehensions so eloquently pressed upon the notice of this court are not real. They are factitious; and may have their effect on a client's cause, but they are not the well-understood interest, or the well-founded apprehensions of the government. The execution of one treaty in a spirit of liberality and good faith, is a higher interest than all the predatory claims of a fleet of privateers.

What has this country to fear? A practical answer is always most satisfactory on such a question; with similar treaties existing with various other powers, what real injury was sustained in the late war? The truth is, and every one conversant in national policy well knows, that there is always less danger of imposition in reality than a limited view of the operation of such a stipulation would suggest. It is not the interest of the belligerent to foster the carrying trade of a commercial rival; hence, Great Britain would rather, in time of war, compel her own vessels to sail under convoy, than permit her merchants to use a neutral bottom. Nations are generally jealous of permitting foreigners to hold domestic tonnage, or use domestic names. There are, commonly, privileges of trade attached to the ship's character, and severe laws enacted against a practice which is always viewed as a fraud upon the government whose flag is thus acquired. Witness the severity of our own laws in such cases.

If there is any nation in the world more interested than all others in the liberal support of the doctrine contended for by this claimant, it is the United States. Our chances of enjoying peace are much greater than any other; and if there be a tendency to war, it is with a nation which will not be driven to the necessity of making use of neutral bottoms. I cannot, therefore, really see why our administration should have been so seriously alarmed at the prospect of our deciding in favor of this Spaniard, as has been urged upon this court.

But, considerations of policy, or the views of the administration, are wholly out of the question in this court. What is the just construction of the treaty, is the only question here. And whether it chime in with the views of the government or not, this individual is entitled to the benefit of that construction.

The more I have examined this subject, the more thoroughly I have been convinced that my view of the construction of the treaty is the correct one, viz., that national protection was to depend upon authentic documents, and not proprietary interest; or more correctly, that each nation should be restricted from looking beyond those documents. There is one provision contained in all these treaties, which sets this point, in my opinion, beyond all doubt. Which is, that in the case of convoy, the word of the commander of the convoying ship is to be taken conclusively for the neutral character of every vessel in the fleet. This is the substitute in the case of a fleet for the passport of a single vessel. I speak of authentic documents; for the absurdity never was imagined that a passport stolen or seized by violence was to have the force of one regularly issued.

But it is contended, that it is due to Spain to pursue these inquiries into proprietary interest, and due to the peace of both nations that such questions should be examined in courts of justice, rather than leave them to be the subjects of diplomatic remonstrance. This is a specious, but very unsound argument. Have not the vexations of courts of vice-admiralty, and the violence of armed cruisers, been the pregnant sources of half the commercial alterations of the last century? This was the evil intended to be remedied, and whatever impositions might flow from the remedy, it was well understood, that the benefits of a commerce uninterrupted by the cupidity of cruising vessels, would more than compensate. There is one consideration, which, on this subject, is conclusive. No sovereign can appear in courts of justice to defend his subjects, and it was, therefore, that a method was devised for taking such questions from courts of justice if possible, and referring them to another tribunal. Every stipulation in the treaties of that day, teems with the project of ridding commerce of vexatious capture, and more vexatious litigation. A better practical illustration of the wisdom of such a measure cannot be imagined than that which the present case presents.

But it has been earnestly and successfully contended, that if such was the intention of the treaty, it must fail altogether for want of the form of a passport, contemplated in the 17th article.

Yet if there is any one question more clear of doubt than all others, I think it is this. For the fallacy of the proposition admits almost of mathematical demonstration. This omission must have been the result of either accident or design. It may have proceeded from accident between the negotiators in Europe; but after the receipt of the treaty, and its submission to the cabinet and the senate here, the omission could not have been the result of accident when it received the sanction of our government. It must, then, have been designedly omitted by our constituted authorities. And for what purpose? Will anyone presume to suggest that it was a deliberate fraud upon the other government? calculated to leave our courts at liberty, on some subsequent day, to declare the 17th and 18th articles in effect void? Did we hold out to them the idea of having adopted the provisions of those articles into our national code, when we were conscious that they contained an innate vice, calculated to defeat every beneficial effect? If the argument on this point could meet the sanction of our government, I would blush for it. From the advocate of a captor, it might have been expected; but cannot lay claim to the sanction or countenance of the American government. I am sensible that the cabinet would disavow such a doctrine.

But, it is urged with much emphasis, that we have no right to annex a form, or to add a clause to the treaty. It is not contended that we have. No member of this bench entertains such a thought. But why may not the contracting parties supply one? All the requisites being prescribed in language, the form and the substance are the same thing. If the contract is complied with, what matters form? Whether it is substantially complied with or not, must be a question for the courts of the contracting parties. But how ridiculous would it be, to be 95*] trying *form, and shape, and size, like the ignorant Arab, where the treaty is substantially complied with. Had it merely stipulated, that a passport, in a form prescribed, should be given mutually, there would have been something in the argument; but in expressing with precision the substance of the instrument to be given, it renders the devising of a form a mere work of supererogation. If no other conclusion is to be drawn from its omission, certainly this may, that it was too trivial to be remembered.

In order to support the argument, that the absence of the form nullifies the 17th and 18th articles of this treaty, the attention of this court has been drawn to the provisions of the 14th article of the treaty with Prussia. And it has been contended, that until a form of a passport be adjusted between the two nations, that article is also a dead letter. The construction is one which could not be supported even on a common law instrument. The words are, "which passports shall be made out in good and due forms (to be settled by conventions between the parties whenever occasion shall require)." If the Spanish treaty is to be construed by analogy to this, the argument is directly on the other side. For these words, obviously leave "the good and due forms" of these instruments to be devised by the parties severally, and only stipulate for settling a form by convention, "whenever occasion shall require;" that is, whenever either shall be dissatisfied with the form used by the other. The nations which, in the very same article, could repose such implicit faith in each other's candor, as to leave the neutrality 96*] of *whole fleets to be determined on the word of the convoying officer, merit more the confidence of each other, than to have imputed to them an evasion so obvious.

As it became indispensable to assign some reason for retaining these two articles in the treaty, if they were to be held a dead letter for want of the form, it has been suggested, that the only operation intended by them was to prescribe a law to the caprice or violence of cruisers, and subject them to more exemplary punishment than in ordinary cases.

No one who reads and compares these four articles, the 15th, 16th, 17th and 18th, and considers the historical events in which they originated, can for a moment suppose that this was the object which led to the insertion of the two latter of those articles. The intention was to ingraft into the law of nations a great and a new principle. And although power and cupidity may affect to sneer at it, and melancholy experience cannot dismiss the apprehension that it is too ethereal to subsist in this nether atmosphere, yet it is one which philanthropy will ever cling to, and justice cherish. To ingraft into this treaty the principles of the armed neutrality was the object, and for this purpose the 15th article declares those principles in detail. The 16th furnishes the exceptions to them; the 17th prescribes the evidence on which those privileges shall be conceded; and the 18th, after regulating the conduct of cruisers towards vessels so protected, proceeds to declare, that "the ship, when she shall have showed such passport, shall be free, and at liberty *to pursue her voyage; so as it shall not [*97 be lawful to molest or give her chase in any manner, or force her to quit her intended course." It is impossible for language to be stronger. That the violation of these stipulated privileges would aggravate the punishment to be inflicted on cruisers, is a consequence of the thing provided for, not the thing itself.

Upon the whole, I am decidedly of opinion that the claimant is entitled to restitution. Nor should I find much difficulty in supporting his right on the ground of proprietary interest. But entertaining the opinion that I do on this preliminary point, there is no necessity to examine into this part of the case.

Sentence affirmed.

Mr. Harper, for the claimant and appellant, moved to vacate the decree of condemnation entered in this cause, and that it should be again continued to the next term in order to enable the claimant to procure farther proof as to the annexation of forms of passports to the original Spanish treaty, and read an affidavit annexed to a printed copy of the treaty, published at the royal printing office in Madrid, which contained two forms of passport, which will be found in the margin.<sup>1</sup>

The passport found on board the Isabella, is materially variant, both in form and substance, from the forms of passport now produced; and to the form of the passport actually annexed to the treaty, and to no other, was the effect intended by the treaty, whatever that effect may be, meant to be attributed. The possession of that form, and not of any other passport which might be substituted for it, was of the very essence of the treaty. It is clear, therefore, that even if the case were as the claimant's counsel supposes, he could derive no benefit whatever from it, because the treaty passport was not on board; and the case must, therefore, in this respect, be judged by the rules of the prize court, independent of the conventional law.

handwriting of the respective parties being admitted; and gave evidence to prove that after bank hours, on Saturday, the fifth of April, 1817, being the second day of grace after the said bill became due, the same was presented by a notary to the acceptor for payment, and not being paid, was duly protested. And on the same day written notice was sent by the mail to the defendant, residing at Georgetown, D. C., notifying him of the non-payment and protest of the bill. And gave evidence that such protest and notice, on the second day of grace, under those circumstances, was conform-

Whereupon the counsel for the defendant prayed the opinion and instruction of the court to the jury, that the defendant, under the circumstances so given in evidence, was not liable in this action, the drawer of the said bill not having received due notice of the dishonor of the same; but that the notice given upon the same day that the payment of the draft was demanded, to wit, on Saturday, the 5th of April, 1817, was not regular and sufficient to charge the defendant in this action. Which instruction the court refused, and the defendant's counsel excepted. A verdict and judgment thereon was rendered for the plaintiff, and the cause was brought by writ of error to this court.

This cause was argued by Mr. Jones for the plaintiff in error, and by Mr. Key for the defendant.

This court were unanimously of opinion that, by the general law merchant, notice of non-payment given to the drawer on the last day of grace, after a demand upon the acceptor on the same day (and Saturday, in this case, was the last day of grace, the next day being Sunday) was sufficient to charge the drawer; and that the notice in this case given to the drawer, by putting the same into the post-office, was good.

LINDENBERGER ET AL. v. BEALL.

After demand of the maker of a note, on the third day of grace, notice to the indorser on the same day, is sufficient by the general law merchant.

Evidence of a letter containing notice, having been put into the post-office, directed to the indorser, at his place of residence, is sufficient proof of the notice to be left to the jury, and it is unnecessary to give notice to the defendant to produce the letter before such evidence can be admitted.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for the District of Columbia.

Assumpsit against the defendant (Beall), as indorser of a promissory note, drawn by one Tunis Craven, dated at Baltimore, October 22d, 1811, in favor of the defendant, and by him indorsed to the plaintiffs, for $191.17, negotiable at the Bank of Washington, payable six months after date. At the trial the note was given in evidence, and the handwriting of the drawer and indorser admitted. The plaintiffs further proved, by a notary, that the note was, by him, demanded of the drawer, on Saturday the 25th of April, 1812, being the day on which it became payable, that is, the last day of grace. And not being paid, notice of the non-payment thereof was inclosed in a letter addressed to the defendant, at the city of Washington, and put into the post-office at Georgetown. The notary testified, that he had no recollection of these facts, *and only knew them from his [*105] notarial book, and the protest made out at the time; by which it appeared, that a demand was then made of the drawer, and the protest made: and notice sent; and from its being his invariable practice to give notice either personally, or by letter, to the indorsers on the same day. Nor did he then recollect that he addressed the letter to the defendant in Washington, but he presumed from this book, and protest, and his uniform practice, that if he did not know where the defendant lived (which was probably the

[LOCAL LAW. PRACTICE.]

THE MECHANICS' BANK OF ALEXANDRIA

v.

WITHERS.

The Circuit Court of the District of Columbia has authority to adjourn to a distant day, and the adjourned session is considered as the same term.

Where the regular term began on the 3d Monday in April, and the court continued to sit, de die in diem, until the 16th of May, when it adjourned to the 4th Monday of June; held, that a defendant, against whom an office judgment had been entered on the 16th of May, had a right, under the laws and practice of Virginia, to appear at the adjourned session, and have the default set aside, on giving special bail, and pleading issuably.

*THIS cause was argued by Mr. Lee and Mr. Swann for the plaintiff in error, and by Mr. Taylor for the defendant in error.

Mr. Chief Justice MARSHALL delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a writ of error to a judgment rendered by the Circuit Court for the District of Columbia, sitting in Alexandria, in an action of debt; and the case depends on the laws of Virginia, as they stood when jurisdiction over the district was first exercised by Congress.

By the law of Virginia, the proceedings, until an issue is made up in a cause, are taken in the clerk's office at monthly rules, and judgments by default become final on the last day of the succeeding term, till which day the defendant in any such action has a legal right to set the judgment aside, and to plead to issue. The Circuit Court held its regular session in April, 1818, and continued to sit regularly till the 16th day of May, when it adjourned to the fourth Monday of the following June. The clerk, considering the day on which the court adjourned as the last day of the term, and the judgments at the rules as having, on that day, become final, issued an execution on one of these judgments, which had been obtained by the plaintiffs against Cave Withers and his common bail. When the court met in June, the defendant appeared, and, on motion, was allowed to set aside the office judgment, give special bail, and plead to issue. The execution was, consequently, quashed. In the course of the term judgment *was confessed by the defendant, [*108 for the sum claimed in the declaration, and a writ of error was then sued out, the object of which was to reverse the last judgment, and good if it duly reaches the party addressed. Bk. of U. S. v. Corcoran, 2 Pet. 121; Foster v. McDonald, 5 Ala. 376; Manchester Bank v. Fellows, 8 Fost. (N. H.) 302; *Whitford v. Notice by mail should be directed to the post-office at, or nearest to, the party's place of residence, unless he is used to receive his letters at another post-office, when it should be directed there; and if he live at one place, and has his place of business at another, notice may be sent to either; but more properly to the place where he usually receives his letters. *Bk. of Columbia v. In New York, a statute provides that the first of January, the 22d of Feby. the 30th May, (Decoration Day), the 4th of July, the 25th of Dec., any general election day, and any day appointed by the Governor, or President of the U. S., as a day of thanksgiving or fasting and prayer, or other religious observance, for all purposes regarding the presenting for payment or acceptance, or of the protesting and giving notice of the dishonor of bills, checks and notes, shall be treated and considered as Sunday, and as public holidays, and all bills, notes and checks, are presentable for acceptance or payment on the secular or business day next preceeding such holiday. Laws of New York, 1881, ch. 30.

set aside all proceedings subsequent to the 16th of May, on the idea, that the judgment rendered at the rules became final on that day.

The sole question in the cause is, whether the adjournment from the 16th of May to the fourth Monday in June, was a continuation of the April term, or constituted a distinct term?

There being nothing in any act of Congress which prevents the courts of the district from exercising a power common to all courts, that of adjourning to a distant day; the adjournment on the 16th of May to the fourth Monday in June, would be a continuance of the same term, unless a special act of Congress, expressly enabling the courts of the district to hold adjourned sessions, may be supposed to vary the law of the case. That act is in these words: "And the said courts are hereby invested with the same power of holding adjourned sessions that are exercised by the courts of Maryland." These words do not, in themselves, purport to vary the character of the session. They do not make the adjourned session a distinct session. They were, probably, inserted from abundant caution, and are to be ascribed to an apprehension, that courts did not possess the power to adjourn to a distant day, until they should be enabled so to do by a legislative act. But this act, affirming a pre-existing power, ought not to be construed to vary the nature of that power, unless words 109* are employed which manifest such intention. In this act, there are no such words, unless they are found in the reference to the courts of Maryland. But on inquiry, we find, that in Maryland, an "adjourned session" is considered as the same session with that at which the adjournment was made. Since, then, the term at which this conditional or office judgment was to become final, was still continuing when it was set aside, and the defendant permitted to plead to the declaration, there was no error in that proceeding.

Judgment affirmed.

HOPKINS v. LEE.

A judgment or decree of a court of competent jurisdiction is conclusive wherever the same matter is again brought in controversy.

But the rule does not apply to points which come only collaterally under consideration, or are only incidentally considered, or can only be argumentatively inferred from the decree.

In an action at law by the vendee, against the vendor, for a breach of the contract, in not delivering the thing sold, the proper measure of damages is not the price stipulated in the contract, but the value at the time of the breach.

This rule applies to the sale of real, as well as personal property: but, Quære, Whether it is the proper measure of damages in the case of an action for eviction.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for the District of Columbia.

This was an action of covenant, brought by the defendant *in error (Lee), against [*110 the plaintiff in error (Hopkins), to recover damages for not conveying certain tracts of military lands, which the plaintiff in error had agreed to convey, upon the defendant in error relieving a certain incumbrance held by one Rawleigh Colston, upon an estate called Hill and Dale, and which Lee had previously granted and sold to Hopkins, and for which the military lands in question were to be received in part payment. The declaration set forth the covenant, and averred that Lee had completely removed the incumbrance, from Hill and Dale. The defendant below pleaded, 1. That he had not completely removed the incumbrance; and, 2. That he (the defendant below) had never been required by Lee to convey the military lands to him; and on these pleas issues were joined. Upon the trial, Lee, in order to prove the incumbrance in question was removed, offered in evidence to the jury a record of the proceeding in chancery, on a bill filed against him in the Circuit Court by Hopkins. The bill stated, that on the 23d of January, 1807, the date of the agreement on which the present action at law was brought, Hopkins purchased of Lee, the estate of Hill and Dale, for which he agreed to pay $18,000, viz., $10,000 in military lands, at settled prices, and to give his bond for the residue, payable in April, 1809. That Lee, in pursuance of this agreement, selected certain military lands in the bill mentioned. That at the time of the purchase of Hill and Dale, it was mortgaged to Colston for a large sum, which Lee had promised to discharge, but had failed so to do, in consequence of which Hopkins had paid off the *mortgage himself. The bill then [*111 claimed a large sum of money from Lee for having removed this incumbrance, and prayed that the defendant might be decreed to pay it, or in default thereof, that the claimant might be authorized by a decree of chancery to sell the military lands, which he considered as a pledge remaining in his hands, and out of the proceeds thereof, to pay himself. On the coming in of Lee's answer, denying several of the allegations of the bill, the cause was referred to a master, who made a report, stating a balance of $427.77 due from Hopkins to Lee. This report was not excepted to, and the court, after referring to it, proceeded to decree the payment of the balance. To this testimony the defendant in the present action objected, so far as respected the reading of the master's report, and the decretal order thereon; but the objection was overruled by the court below, and the evidence admitted. The counsel for the plaintiff in error then prayed the court to instruct the jury, that in the assessment of damages, they should take the price of the military lands as agreed upon by the parties in the articles of agreement upon which the action was brought, as the measure of damages for the breach of covenant. But the court refused to give this instruction, and directed the jury to take the price of the lands, at the time they ought to have been conveyed, as the measure of damages. To this instruction the plaintiff in error excepted; and a verdict and judgment thereon being rendered for the plaintiff below, the cause was brought by writ of error to this court.

112*] **Mr. Pinkney* and Mr. Swann, for the plaintiff in error, argued, 1. That the proceedings in chancery were not admissible evidence in the action at law. A verdict and judgment are indeed conclusive evidence between the same parties; but the other proceedings in the cause, and all that which is merely inducement to the verdict or judgment, are not evidence. So, a decree in chancery is not conclusive evidence of all the facts in the course of the cause. Not that the decree is not conclusive as a res judicata, but the decree here is no otherwise conclusive than as giving the party, in whose favor it was pronounced, a right to have it executed. It is not evidence at all, unless it be conclusive evidence; but it cannot be conclusive evidence of the details of the cause, and of the incidental questions which arose in its progress. 2. The proper measure of damages in the action at law, was the price agreed by the parties. When a portion of the price of land is to be paid for in other land, the pecuniary price, with interest, is the rule at law, where specific performance is not called for. It is thus subjected to the analogical rule in the Court of Chancery, where the contract is rescinded, instead of being specifically performed.

Mr. Jones and Mr. Lee, for the defendant in error, insisted, 1. That the proceedings in chancery were not only admissible evidence in the suit at law, but conclusive evidence. It may be safely admitted that the decree is not evidence of such facts as are only collaterally or incidentally drawn in question,*or [*113 can only be argumentatively inferred from the decree. But where the decree professes to be founded on a particular fact, which was the principal question in issue, and was ascertained by the master's report, it must be conclusive in any other suit between the same parties. 2. As to the proper measure of damages, it is the settled doctrine of this court, that in an action by the purchaser for a breach of the contract of sale, the rule of damages is the price of the article at the time of the breach.<sup>1</sup> It is true, that the case of Shepherd v. Hampton was a sale of goods; but it is not perceived that there is any difference in the application of the principle to real or to personal property.

Mr. Justice LIVINGSTON delivered the opinion of the court:

The first question which this court has to consider is, whether the proceedings in chancery were properly admitted in evidence in the court below.

It is not denied, as a general rule, that a fact which has been directly tried, and decided by a court of competent jurisdiction, cannot be contested again between the same parties, in the same or any other court. Hence a verdict and judgment of a court of record, or a decree in chancery, although not binding on strangers, puts an end to all further controversy concerning the points thus decided between the parties to such suit. In this, there is and ought to be, no difference between a verdict and judgment

1.—Shepherd v. Hampton, 3 Wheat. Rep. 200.

Dorsey, 1 Gill & J. 440; Gibbs v. Jemison, 12 Ala. 820.

In New York, the English rule, established by the cases of Flureau v. Thornhill, and Bain v. Fothergill, supra, is followed with some exceptions.

The general rule in N. Y., in the case of executory contracts for the sale of land, is that, in case of breach by the vendor, the vendee can recover only nominal damages, unless he has paid part of the purchase money, in which case he can also recover such purchase money and interest. Baldwin v. Munn, 2 Wend. 399; Peters v. McKeon, 4 Denio, 546; Cooper v. Weaver, 20 N. Y. 145; Mack v. Patchin, 42 N. Y. 167; Margraff v. Muir, 57 N. Y. 155; Stanton v. Miller, 14 Hun. 383.

In a later case the court say, that the rule is well settled that where the vendor enters into a contract to sell and convey real estate under a belief that he has a good title, and that the same is free from incumbrances, and he fails to perform for the reason that the title is defective, or an incumbrance unknown to him previously is discovered, which prevents a fulfillment of the contract, in an action by the vendee against him for a breach of the contract, the latter is only liable for nominal damages, aside from the purchase money paid and the expense of examining the title. Cockroft v. N. Y. & H. R. Co., 69 N. Y. 201.

To this rule there are exceptions, based upon the wrongful conduct of the vendor, which are stated by Judge Earl, as follows: "As if he is guilty of fraud, or can convey but will not, either from perverseness or to secure a better bargain, or if he has covenanted to convey when he knew he had no authority to contract to convey, or where it is in his power to remedy a defect in his title, and he refuses or neglects to do so, or where he refuses to incur such reasonable expenses as would enable him to fulfill his contract. In all such cases, the vendor is liable to the vendee for the loss of the bargain, under rules analogous to those applied in the sale of personal property." Margraff v. Muir, 57 N. Y. 155.

And where the vendor knew at the time of contracting that he had not title, or the power of conveyance, although he acted in good faith and believed that he should be able to procure a good title, it was held that the vendee was entitled to recover of the vendor the difference between the contract price and the value of the land, at the time of the breach. Pumpelly v. Phelps, 40 N. Y. 59. See Trull v. Granger, 4 Seld. 115; Brinkerhoof v. Phelps, 24 Barb. 100; 43 Barb. 469.

In Virginia the same general rule has been laid down, and similar exceptions thereto made, as in N. Y. Thompson's Ex'rs v. Guthrie, 9 Leigh, 111; Wilson v. Spencer, 11 Leigh, 241.

Also in Kentucky. Allen v. Anderson, 2 Bibb, 415; McConnell v. Dunlop, Hardin, 41; Handley v. Chambers, 1 Littell's R. 358; Patrick v. Marshall, 2 Bibb, 40; Fisher v. Kay, 2 Bibb, 434. These latter cases were in equity, however. See Stewart v. Noble, 1 Iowa, 26; Nichols v. Freeman, 11 Ired. 99.

114*] *in a court of common law, and a decree of a court of equity. They both stand on the same footing, and may be offered in evidence under the same limitations, and it would be difficult to assign a reason why it should be otherwise. The rule has found its way into every system of jurisprudence, not only from its obvious fitness and propriety, but because without it, an end could never be put to litigation. It is, therefore, not confined in England or in this country to judgments of the same court, or to the decisions of courts of concurrent jurisdiction, but extends to matters litigated before competent tribunals in foreign countries. It applies to sentences of courts of admiralty—to ecclesiastical tribunals—and, in short, to every court which has proper cognizance of the subject-matter, so far as they profess to decide the particular matter in dispute. Under this rule, the decree in this case was proper evidence, if it decided, or professed to decide, the same question which was made on the trial at law. For to points which came only collaterally under consideration, or were only incidentally under cognizance, or could only be inferred by arguing from the decree, it is admitted that the rule does not apply. On a reference to the proceedings at law, and in chancery, in the case now before us, the court is satisfied that the question which arose on the trial of the action of covenant, was precisely the same, if not exclusively so (although that was not necessary), as the one which had already been directly decided by the Court of Chancery. The bill, which was filed by the present plaintiff in error, states, that on the 115*] 23d of January, *1807, which is the date of the agreement on which the action at law is brought, Hopkins purchased of Lee the estate of Hill and Dale, for which he was to pay $18,000—that is, $10,000 in military lands at settled prices, and the remainder in bonds, payable in April, 1809. That Lee, in pursuance of this agreement, selected certain military lands in the bill mentioned. That at the time of the purchase of Hill and Dale, it was mortgaged to Rawleigh Colston for a large sum, which Lee had promised to discharge, but that he had failed so to do, in consequence of which, Hopkins had paid the mortgage himself. The complainant then claims a large sum from Lee for having removed this incumbrance, and prays that the defendant may be decreed to pay it, or in default thereof, that the complainant may be authorized, by a decree of the court, to sell the military lands, which he considered as a pledge in his hands, and out of the proceeds to pay himself. Not a single demand is stated in the bill, except the one arising out of the complainant's extinguishment of the incumbrance, which Lee had taken upon himself to remove.

On Lee's answer coming in, denying several of the allegations of the bill, the cause is referred to a master commissioner, who, after a long investigation, in the presence of both parties, and the examination of many witnesses, makes a report by which Hopkins is made a debtor of Lee in the sum of $427.77. On inspection of this report, it will be seen that the chief, if not the only controversy between the parties was, whether Hill and Dale had been 116*] relieved *from its incumbrance to Colston, by funds furnished by Lee to Hopkins for that purpose, and that unless that fact had been found affirmatively, a report could not have been made in Lee's favor. The court, after referring to this report, and stating that it had not been excepted to, proceeds to decree the payment of this balance by the complainant to the defendant. From this summary review of the proceedings in chancery, the conclusion seems inevitable, that the chief, if not sole matter in litigation in that suit, was whether Hill and Dale had been freed of the incumbrance to Colston, by Lee or by Hopkins, and that the report and subsequent decree proceeded on the ground, and established the fact, that Lee had discharged it, which was also the only point put in issue by the first plea of the defendant in the action of covenant. No rule of evidence, therefore, is violated in saying that this decree was properly admitted by the Circuit Court. But if the decree were admissible, it is supposed that the report of the master ought not to have been submitted to the jury. The court entertains a different opinion. No reason has been assigned why a decision by a proper and sworn officer of a court of chancery, in the presence and hearing of both parties, according to the acknowledged practice and usage of the court, on the very matters in controversy, not excepted to by either party, and confirmed by the court, should not be as satisfactory evidence of any fact found by it, as the verdict of the jury, on which a judgment is afterwards rendered. The advantage which a verdict may be supposed to possess over a report, from its being *the decision of twelve, instead of the *117 opinion of a single man, is perhaps more than counterbalanced by the time which is allowed to a master for deliberation, and a more thorough investigation of the matters in controversy. But a better and more satisfactory answer is, that it is the usual, known, and approved practice of the court to whose jurisdiction the parties had submitted themselves. But if this document be withheld from a jury, how are they or the court to arrive at the grounds of the decree, or a knowledge of the points or matters which have been decided in the cause? Without it, the decree may be intelligible; but the grounds on which it proceeds, or the facts which it means to decide, may be liable to much uncertainty and conjecture. The report, therefore, as well as the decree, was proper evidence, not only of the fact that such report and decree had been made, but of the matter which they professed directly to decide. We are not now called upon to say, whether, in those respects, they were conclusive, as they do not appear to have been offered with that view; but without meaning to deny to them such effect, we only say, which is all that the present case requires, that they were competent and proper, in the absence of other testimony, to establish the fact of the removal of the incumbrance by the defendant Lee, from the estate of Hill and Dale.

In the assessment of damages, the counsel for the plaintiff in error, prayed the court to instruct the jury, that they should take the price of the land, as agreed upon by the parties in the articles of agreement upon which the suit was brought, for their government. But *the court refused to give this instruction. *118 tion, and directed the jury to take the price of the lands, at the time they ought to have been conveyed, as the measure of damages. To this instruction the plaintiff in error excepted. The rule is settled in this court, that in an action by the vendee for a breach of contract on the part of the vendor, for not delivering the article, the measure of damages is its price at the time of the breach. The price being settled by the contract, which is generally the case, makes no difference, nor ought it to make any; otherwise the vendor, if the article have risen in value, would always have it in his power to discharge himself from his contract, and put the enhanced value in his own pocket. Nor can it make any difference in principle, whether the contract be for the sale of real or personal property, if the lands, as is the case here, have not been improved or built on. In both cases, the vendee is entitled to have the thing agreed for, at the contract price, and to sell it himself at its increased value. If it be withheld, the vendor ought to make good to him the difference. This is not an action for eviction, nor is the court now prescribing the proper rule of damages in such a case.<sup>1</sup>

[*LOCAL LAW.]

v.

POWELL ET AL., LESSEE.

The execution by a public officer of a power to sell lands for the non-payment of taxes, must be in strict pursuance of the law under which it is made, or no title is conveyed.

It is essential to the validity of the sale of lands for taxes, under the laws of Tennessee, that it should appear on the record of the court, by which the order of sale is made, that the sheriff had returned that there were no goods and chattels of the delinquent proprietor out of which the taxes could be made.

The publications which are required by law to be made, subsequent to the sheriff's return, and previous to the order of sale, are indispensable preliminaries to a valid order of sale.

In summary proceedings, where a court exercises an extraordinary power under a special statute, which prescribes its course, that course ought to be strictly pursued, and the facts which give jurisdiction, ought to appear on the face of the record. Otherwise, the proceedings are not merely voidable, but absolutely void, as being coram non iudice.

In construing local statutes respecting real property, this court is governed by the decisions of the state tribunals.

ERROR to the Circuit Court of West Tennessee.

This cause was argued at the last term, and at the present term the opinion of the court was delivered by Mr. Chief Justice MARSHALL:

1.—As to the damages recoverable upon an eviction of real property, vide ante, Vol. II., p. 62, note 1.

NOTE.—See Note to Williams v. Peyton, 4 Wheat. 77.

Wheat. 6.

This was an action of ejectment instituted by the defendants in error against the plaintiffs, to recover 640 acres of land in Montgomery county. Upon the trial in the court below, the lessors of the plaintiffs, in support of their title, read in evidence a grant from *the state of North Carolina to Stokeley Donaldson, dated the 12th of January, 1797; also a deed for the same land from the said Donaldson to John Love, dated the 13th of January, 1797, and registered in Montgomery county, on the 25th of July, 1815, upon a probate made in the County Court of Grange county, at May term of the said court, 1814.

The defendants in that court, to support their title, read in evidence a transcript of a record from the County Court of Montgomery county, at their July session of 1801, as follows, viz.:

“Haydon Wells, who was appointed by the court of January term, 1801, to receive the list of taxable property in Captain Boyd's company, reports to court a list of taxable property in the county of Montgomery, not listed for the year 1799, nor taxes paid thereon, to wit, among others, ‘Stokeley Donaldson, 2,560 acres on Yellow Creek waters.’

“HAYDON WELLS, T. P.”

“Ordered, that the clerk make out a certificate of lands and tenements reported by Haydon Wells, Esq., for the year 1799, that are liable to the payment of taxes, agreeably to the 14th section of ‘an act to ascertain what property in this state shall be deemed taxable, and the mode of collecting, accounting for, and paying public taxes.’ And now, to wit, at January term, 1802, the following proceedings were had thereon, to wit, on motion, it is ordered, adjudged, and decreed, that the tracts of land entered in the names of the following persons, be subject *to the payment of [*121 taxes due thereon, agreeably to report of Haydon Wells, Esq., receiver of taxable property, as delinquent for the year 1799, agreeably to law, and that execution issue accordingly:” (among others) Stokeley Donaldson, $11.90. Upon which order or judgment, an execution, bearing date the fourth Monday in March, 1802, was issued to the sheriff of Montgomery county, commanding him, that of the lands of Stokeley Donaldson, reported to be in arrears for taxes for the year 1799, he cause to be made the sum of $11.90, as, also, the sum of $1.40, and charges, &c. Upon this execution the sheriff made the following return:

“Levied on 2133, and advertised agreeably to the old; not sold, because the new act which requires it to be advertised in the Gazette did not come forward till the day of sale.

“JOHN SAUNDERS, Sheriff M. C.”

On the 1st of May, 1802, an alias execution issued, bearing date the fourth Monday in April, 1802, in the words of the former, on which the sheriff made the following return: “The within land sold agreeably to law, on the 23d of July, 1802, at seven mills per acre.” They also read in evidence a deed from John Coeke, sheriff of Montgomery county, to Samuel Vanee, one of the defendants, dated the 14th of April, 1808, reciting, that whereas John Saunders, late sheriff of Montgomery county, did, on the 23d of July, 1802, by virtue of an execution or order of sale, to him directed, from the court of 122* Montgomery county, expose to sale 2,560 acres of land granted to Stokeley Donaldson, or so much thereof as would be sufficient to satisfy the taxes due thereon for the year 1799, agreeably to an act of Assembly in such cases made and provided. And whereas Morgan Brown became the purchaser of 2,229 6-7 acres of the said land at seven mills per acre, he being the highest and best bidder, the taxes and costs due thereon being $17.10; and the said Morgan Brown having authorized a deed to be made therefor to Samuel Vance: Now, the said John Cocke, in consideration of the said sum being paid to the said John Saunders, sheriff, &c., doth sell and convey the said 2,229 6-7 acres of land, &c. The said deed then described one tract of 640 acres, the tract in question; also two other tracts of 640 acres each; also, one other part of a survey of land of 309 acres granted to Stokeley Donaldson.

The lessors of the plaintiffs then introduced grants from the state of North Carolina to Stokeley Donaldson, all dated about the same time, for two different tracts of land of 640 acres each, a part of which are those described in the said sheriff's deed, all lying upon the waters of Yellow Creek, and proved that the same lay in one connection of surveys adjoining each other, but those described in the sheriff's deed were of much the greatest value.

Upon this evidence the court instructed the jury, that it was for them to determine whether the said lands in the said Sheriff's deed mentioned, were the same lands which the former 123* Sheriff Saunders had *sold or not. If not the same land, then the said sheriff's deed was not good in law. And the court farther instructed the jury, that the said record, or anything therein contained, was not sufficient in law to authorize the sale of the lands made by the said Sheriff Saunders, nor the deed aforesaid made to the said Vance by the said John Cocke, the said successor of the said Saunders, and that the said sale and deed did not in law vest any title to said lands in the said Samuel Vance.

To this instruction of the court, the counsel for the defendants excepted. In consequence of this instruction, the jury found a verdict for the plaintiffs, and the judgment was accordingly rendered in their favor. The cause was then brought by writ of error to this court.

The objections made on the record to the title papers of the plaintiff, so far as respects their registration, have not been pressed in this court, and do not appear to be sustainable. The plaintiffs in error rely principally on the deed made by John Cocke, the sheriff of Montgomery county, on the 14th of April, 1808, and insist that the instruction given by the Circuit Court to the jury, on this point, is erroneous.

The validity of this deed depends on the act passed by the legislature of the state of Tennessee, on the 25th of October, 1797, respecting the collection of taxes. The 3d section of that act directs the court of each county, at its session, in the month of January, in each year, to appoint a justice of the *peace, [*124 for each captain's district in the county, to receive lists of the taxable property, for the then present year."

The 5th section makes it the duty of the sheriff to discover, and report in writing, to the clerk of the court, such taxable property as may not have been returned within the time limited by law.

The 6th section directs non-residents to return to the court an inventory of their taxable property.

The 9th section enacts, that if any non-resident "shall fail, by himself, his agent, or attorney, to return his, her, or their taxable property, as by the act directed, the property of such person, so failing, shall be liable, and stand bound to pay a fine of fifty dollars, and a double tax, to be collected and paid, as by this act directed, and the justice shall report the said property to the best of his knowledge and information as aforesaid."

The 13th section directs the sheriff, in the event of non-payment of taxes by a specified time, "to levy the same by distress and sale of the goods and chattels of every person so neglecting."

And the 14th section directs the sheriff, in case there shall not be any goods and chattels on which distress may be made, to report the same to the court of the county, whose duty it is "forthwith to direct the clerk to make out a certificate of the lands and tenements liable for payment of the said taxes, together with the amount of taxes and charges due thereon." This is to be published, and if no person shall pay the taxes and other charges, within thirty days, the "court shall enter up judgment *for the amount of taxes due," &c., for [*125 which execution shall issue, under which execution the land may be sold and conveyed by the sheriff.

That no individual or public officer can sell, and convey a good title to, the land of another, unless authorized so to do by express law, is one of those self-evident propositions to which the mind assents, without hesitation; and that the person invested with such a power, must pursue with precision the course prescribed by law, or his act is invalid, is a principle which has been repeatedly recognized in this court. The validity of the sale and deed made by the sheriff of Montgomery county will then depend on the regularity of the order under which the sale was made, and on the question whether that order, if erroneous, will still support the sale which has been made in pursuance of it.

Previous to an order for the sale of lands for the non-payment of taxes, the sheriff is ordered to levy them by distress and sale of the goods and chattels of the delinquent; and if there be no such goods and chattels, he is to report the same to the court, as the foundation of any proceeding against the lands. By this act, no jurisdiction is given to the court over the lands of a person who has failed to pay his taxes, until the sheriff shall report that there are no goods and chattels out of which the taxes may be made.

This being an important fact on which the jurisdiction of the court depends, it ought, we think, to appear on record, either in the judgment itself, or in the previous proceedings.

In this case no such report appears to have 126* been *made. Could it even be contended that this report might be presumed, the answer is, that the terms of the order exclude such a presumption. It would appear, that the report of the magistrate, that the land in question had not been listed, was made in July, 1801, and that the court immediately made that order which the law directs to be made on the sheriff's report, that there are no goods and chattels; and this order refers not to any report of the sheriff, not to any deficiency of goods and chattels, but to the report of the justice of peace, that the lands have not been listed.

This is not the only defect which appears in these proceedings. Previous to an order for a sale of land, and subsequent to the report of the sheriff, certain publications are to be made in the manner and form prescribed by the act. These publications are indispensable preliminaries to the order of sale. They do not appear to have been made. The judgment against the land was given at January term, 1802, on motion, without its appearing by recital or otherwise, that the requisites of the law, in this respect, had been complied with, and that the tax still remained unpaid.

We think this ought to have appeared in the record.

The argument is, that the judgment, for these errors in the proceedings of the county court, may be voidable, but is not void; that until it be reversed, it is capable of supporting those subsequent proceedings which were founded on it.

127* We think otherwise. In summary proceedings, where a court exercises an extraordinary power under a special statute prescribing its course, we think that course ought to be exactly observed, and those facts especially which give jurisdiction, ought to appear, in order to show that its proceedings are coram judice. Without this act of assembly, the order for sale would have been totally void. This act gives the power only on a report to be made by the sheriff. This report gives the court jurisdiction, and without it the court is as powerless as if the act had never passed.

In construing the acts of the legislature of a state, the decisions of the state tribunals have always governed this court. In Tennessee, the question arising in this cause, after considerable discussion, seems to have been finally settled on principles which are thought entirely correct. The case of Francis' Lessee v. Washburn & Russell, reported in 5 Haywood, is this very case, and was decided as this case was decided in the Circuit Court. On the authority of that case, and on principle, the court is of opinion, that there is no error in the judgment of the Circuit Court.

MAYHEW V. THATCHER ET AL.

As by the laws of Louisiana, questions of fact in civil cases are tried by the court, unless either of the parties demands a jury; in an action of debt on a judgment, the interest on the original judgment may be computed and make part of the judgment in Louisiana, without a writ of inquiry and the intervention of a jury.

The record of a judgment in one state, is conclusive evidence in another, although it appears that the suit, in which it was rendered, was commenced by an attachment of property, the defendant having afterwards appeared and taken defense.

ERROR to the District Court of Louisiana.

This was an action of debt commenced by the defendants in error against the plaintiff in error in the District Court of Louisiana, upon a judgment obtained in the Circuit Court of Massachusetts. The original suit, in which the judgment was obtained, was commenced by a process of foreign attachment, according to the local laws of Massachusetts; but the defendant, Mayhew, subsequently appeared and took defense. The cause was referred to arbitrators, and judgment rendered upon their report against the defendant, Mayhew, for the sum of $4,788.57 debt, and $284.33 costs. The defendants in error having declared upon this judgment against the plaintiff in the District Court of Louisiana, the plaintiff in error pleaded nil debet, to which plea there was a general demurrer, and judgment being rendered thereon for the defendants in error, for the 130* sum of $5,072.90 debt, with interest thereon, &c., and the cause was brought before this court.

This cause was argued by Mr. C. J. Ingersoll for the plaintiff in error, and by Mr. Hopkinson and Mr. Mills for the defendants in error.<sup>1</sup>

Mr. Chief Justice MARSHALL delivered the opinion of the court, that as by the local laws and practice of Louisiana, questions of fact in civil cases were tried by the court, unless either of the parties demanded a jury, the interest upon the original judgment in Massachusetts might be computed, and make a part of the judgment in Louisiana, without a writ of inquiry and the intervention of a jury. And that although the original suit was commenced by an attachment, yet that the defendant, Mayhew, had personal notice of the suit, and afterwards appeared and took defense, so that even supposing there was any objection to the proceeding by attachment, it was cured by the appearance of the defendant, and his litigating the suit.

Judgment affirmed.

FARMERS' AND MECHANICS' BANK OF PENNSYLVANIA

v.

SMITH.

An act of a state legislature which discharges a debtor from all liability for debts contracted previous to his discharge, on his surrendering his property for the benefit of his creditors, is a law impairing the obligation of contracts within the meaning of the constitution of the United States, so far as it attempts to discharge the contract; and it makes no difference in such a case, that the suit was brought in a state court of the state, of which both the parties were citizens, where the contract was made, and the discharge obtained, and where they continued to reside until the suit was brought.

This was an action of assumpsit brought by the plaintiffs in error, in the Supreme Court of the commonwealth of Pennsylvania, against the defendant in error, as indorser of a promissory note, made at Philadelphia by one Edward Shoemaker, on the 6th of June, 1811, for $2,500, payable in six months after date, and indorsed by the defendant to the plaintiffs at the same place, on the same day. The declaration was in the usual form; and the defendant pleaded, that on the 8th day of September, 1812, he was a citizen of the said commonwealth, residing in the city and county of Philadelphia, and having resided there for more than two years before that time; and that being such citizen and resident, he, the defendant, in conformity to the act of the *legislature of the said commonwealth, [*132 passed on the 13th of March, 1812, entitled, "An act for the relief of insolvent debtors residing in the city and county of Philadelphia," did, on the said 8th day of September, 1812, at the city of Philadelphia aforesaid, present his petition to Charles Jared Ingersoll, &c., the commissioners appointed under and by virtue of said act, &c.: in which petition, he, the said petitioner, did state his belief, that he was insolvent, and did pray that he might be permitted to assign all his estate and property for the benefit of his creditors, and be discharged by virtue of said act. Whereupon the said commissioners did appoint Mathew Randall, &c., to be curators, to whom the defendant did thereupon forthwith assign all his estate, real and personal, in conformity with the provisions of the said act. And the said commissioners did then and there appoint the second day of October, 1812, aforesaid, for the hearing the defendant and his creditors, of which due notice was given according to the provisions of the act aforesaid. Upon which day, &c., the said petitioner did exhibit a true account and list of all his creditors, and moneys due, and to become due, and owing to them respectively by him; and, also, an inventory and account of his estate, real and personal, and of all interest of him, the said petitioner, either present or contingent, in anything of value, and of all books, vouchers, and securities relating to the same. And thereupon the said Charles Jared Ingersoll, one of the said commissioners, did administer to him, the said petitioner, the oath required by the said law, which was duly *taken by him, the [*133 said petitioner, according to the requisition of the said law. And, afterwards, &c., the said commissioners did assign to Chandler Price, &c., who were duly nominated and appointed assignees, all the estate, real and personal, of him the said petitioner, or which was of him the said petitioner, at the time of the provisional assignment so as aforesaid made to the curators aforesaid. And the said commissioners did appoint the 15th day of October, then next, for a second examination of him the said petitioner. Upon which second examination, it appearing to the satisfaction of the said commissioners, that the said petitioner had not concealed any part of his property, &c., and he, the said petitioner, having also, in all other things, conformed to the provisions of the said act, the said commissioners did, then and there, give to him, the said petitioner, a certificate, under their hands and seals, that he, the said petitioner, had, in all things, conformed to, and was discharged by, said act. The plea also averred, that the cause of action arose in the city and county of Philadelphia, from contracts made within the same, and that the plaintiffs and defendants were, at the time the said contracts were made, and at the time the causes of action accrued, and at the time the said act passed, citizens of the state of Pennsylvania, and still continued to be citizens thereof. To this plea there was a demurrer; and judgment being rendered thereon for the defendant, the cause was brought by writ of error to this court.

134*] *This cause was argued by Mr. Hopkinson for the plaintiffs, and by Mr. Sergeant for the defendant.

Mr. Chief Justice MARSHALL delivered the opinion of the court, that this case was not distinguishable from its former decisions on the same subject,<sup>1</sup> except by the circumstances, that the defendant in the present case, was a citizen of the same state with the plaintiffs, at the time the contract was made in that state, and remained such at the time the suit was commenced in its courts. But that these facts made no difference in the cases. The constitution of the United States was made for the whole people of the Union, and is equally binding upon all the courts and all the citizens.

Judgment reversed.

JUDGMENT.—This cause came on to be heard on the transcript of the record of the Supreme Court for the Eastern District of the commonwealth of Pennsylvania, and was argued by counsel. On consideration whereof, the court is of opinion, that the said Supreme Court for the Eastern District of the commonwealth of Pennsylvania, erred in giving judgment for the defendant, on the demurrer of the plaintiffs to the plea of the said defendant. It is, therefore, adjudged and ordered, that the judgment of the said Supreme Court for the Eastern District of the commonwealth of Pennsylvania be, and 135*] *the same is hereby reversed and annulled. #### [COMMON LAW. CONSTRUCTION OF STATUTE.]

UNITED STATES v. WILKINS.

Where, in a contract with the Secretary of War, for supplying the troops of the United States with provisions, specific prices are stipulated for rations issued at certain places mentioned in the contract; and it is further provided, that "should any rations be required at any places not specified in this contract, the price of the same shall be hereafter agreed on betwixt the public and the contractor:" if the parties cannot agree upon the price for the rations thus required, a reasonable compensation is to be allowed, and is to be proved by competent evidence, and settled by a jury; and the contractor, upon the trial, is at liberty to show, that the sum allowed by the Secretary of War is not a reasonable compensation.

Under the 3d and 4th sections of the act of the 3d of March, 1797, ch. 74, the defendant is entitled, at the trial, to the full benefit of any credit in his favor, whether arising out of the particular transaction for which he was sued, or out of distinct and independent transactions, which would constitute a legal or equitable set-off, in whole or in part, of the debt sued for by the United States.

THIS was an action of debt brought in the District Court of Kentucky against the defendant, a former contractor for supplying the troops of the United States with provisions. The defendant pleaded nil debet. The attorney of the United States, to support the issue on the part of the United States, produced a certain account marked A. The counsel for the defendant, to support the issue on his part, produced the contract marked B; also, a paper marked C, and an account for contingent claims, marked D. By the contract entered into between the defendant and the Secretary of War, on the 3d of July, 1801, it was, among other things, agreed, that the contractor should receive "for every complete ration issued at the Chickasaw Bluffs, at Nashville, at Bear Creek, on the Tennessee, or at any other place on the road between Nashville and Bear Creek, fourteen cents;" and "for every complete ration issued at any place in the Chickasaw or Choctaw country, on the road between Bear Creek and Natchez, eighteen cents and one-half cent;" and that, "should any rations be required at any places, or within any other districts not specified in this contract, the price of the same shall be hereafter agreed on betwixt the public and the contractor."

It appeared from the evidence, that at the time the contract was entered into, the road from Nashville to Natchez crossed the Tennessee River at the mouth of Bear Creek, which empties into the Tennessee River on the south-west side. That after the date of the contract, a new road from Nashville to Natchez, passing through the Chickasaw and Choctaw country, was cut out by the United States troops, which crossed the Tennessee River about twelve or fourteen miles above the mouth of Bear Creek, and *about ten miles further [137 from Nashville. That during the continuance of the contract, a cantonment was established on the south-west side of the Tennessee River, at the crossing point of the new road, and in the Chickasaw country. That the rations on which the two first deductions were made in the paper marked C, were issued at this cantonment, and on the new road as far as Bear Creek. That supplying rations at the cantonment, and on the road as aforesaid, was more expensive to the contractor than it would have been at the mouth of Bear Creek. That Fort Deposit is situated on the road from Natchez to Nashville, on the north-east side of the Bayou Piere, about half a mile above the Grindstone Ford. That when the contract was entered into, the Bayou Piere was considered the Choctaw boundary; but at the treaty afterwards held at Fort Adams, it was discovered, that an old boundary line existed between the Choctaw Indians and the French, twenty miles in advance from the Grindstone Ford, and this line was adopted in the treaty. That at this post the rations were deposited, on which the third deduction was made in the paper marked C.

On the trial of this cause, the following questions occurred:

1. Whether, under the contract marked B,

the defendant was entitled to the sums, or either of them, disallowed in the papers C and D, which had been presented to the proper officers, and by them disallowed.

2. If the defendant be not entitled to the 138* amount *claimed in the first, second and third items, or either of them, in the paper marked C, on the ground, that the place at which the rations were delivered is not specially provided for in the contract, has he a right to show that the sum allowed by the Secretary of War for those rations is not a reasonable compensation?

3. Upon such proof, is the defendant entitled to a reasonable compensation for those rations to be ascertained by the jury?

4. If the defendant be entitled to any of the above sums, can he be permitted to claim a credit for them in this suit?

The opinions of the judges of the Circuit Court being opposed upon these questions, they were ordered to be certified to this court, according to the act of Congress.

This cause was argued by the Attorney-General<sup>1</sup> for the United States, and by Mr. Jones and Mr. B. Hardin for the defendant.

Mr. Justice STORY delivered the opinion of 139* the *court: This case comes up from the Circuit Court of Kentucky, upon a division of opinion of the judges upon certain questions stated in the record.

It appears from the record, that the defendant, on the 3d of July, 1801, entered into certain articles of agreement with the Secretary at War, for supplying the troops of the United States with provisions, at certain places enumerated in the contract. Among other things, the articles provided, that the contractor should receive, "for every complete ration issued at the Chickasaw Bluffs, at Nashville, at Bear Creek, on the Tennessee, or at any place on the road between Nashville and Bear Creek, fourteen cents;" and, "for every complete ration issued at any place in the Chickasaw or Choctaw country, on the road between Bear Creek and Natchez, eighteen cents and one-half cent;" and that, "should any rations be required at any places or within any other districts not specified in this contract, the price of the same shall be hereafter agreed on betwixt the public and the contractor."

At the time the contract was entered into, the road from Nashville to Natchez crossed the Tennessee river at the mouth of Bear Creek, which empties into Tennessee River on the south-west side. After the date of the contract, a new road from Nashville to Natchez, passing through the Chickasaw and Choctaw country, was cut by the United States troops, which crossed the Tennessee River about twelve or fourteen miles above the mouth of Bear Creek, and about ten miles further from Nashville. During the continuance of the contract, a cantonment *was established on the south- [*140 west side of the river Tennessee, at the crossing point of the new road, and in the Chickasaw country. At this cantonment certain rations were issued by the defendant, for which he claimed the contract price of eighteen and a half cents a ration, as rations issued in the Chickasaw country. This claim was disallowed by the treasury department, and constitutes the first and second items of an account presented to the treasury, and referred to in the first question as the paper marked C. The remaining item of the same account, which was disallowed by the treasury, was for certain rations deposited at Fort Deposit, for which the defendant claimed, also, the contract price of eighteen and a half cents a ration, as rations issued in the Choctaw country. At the time the contract was made, Fort Deposit was considered within the Choctaw boundary; but at the treaty afterwards held at Fort Adams, it was discovered, that an old boundary line existed between the French and the Choctaws, which was the line adopted by that treaty, and excluded Fort Deposit from the Choctaw country. There is another account annexed to the record marked D, consisting of certain claims of the defendant against the United States, which were presented to and disallowed by the treasury department. Upon these claims it is unnecessary to say more than that this court entirely concurs in the opinion of the treasury department.

The first question, then, is, whether the defendant is entitled to any or all the items disallowed by *the treasury department in [*141 the account C. It is contended on behalf of the United States, that the two first items for rations issued and deposited at the cantonment on the new road on Bear Creek, were within that part of the contract providing for rations issued "at any place on the road between Nashville and Bear Creek," for which the defendant was entitled to the contract price of fourteen cents only; and that this sum had been allowed therefor at the treasury. On the other hand, the defendant's counsel pretends, as has been already stated, that this cantonment was within the Chickasaw country, and that the phrase, "Bear Creek on the Tennessee," in the contract, means the mouth of Bear Creek, on the Tennessee; so that the defendant is entitled to the contract price of eighteen and a half cents.

We are, however, of opinion, on this point, that the contract must necessarily be presumed to refer to the actual state of things at the time of its inception, inasmuch as there is nothing in it which shows that the parties had in contemplation any prospective changes. The phrase, "Bear Creek, on the Tennessee," seems to be an unusual description of the junction of a creek with a river; but in its connection with the context, we are unable to give it any other rational interpretation. And if this were even doubtful, we are of opinion, that the road between Nashville and Bear Creek, spoken of in the contract, is the road then in existence and use between those places, and cannot, in the absence of all evidence of intention, be construed to mean a new road not then laid out or made, nor shown to be in *the contemplation of the parties. [*142 The rations, then, issued and deposited at the can-

1.—He cited the case of The Commonwealth v. Matlack, 4 Dall. 303, in which it was held by the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, under the statute of that state, that a debtor to the commonwealth, who was sued by it, could not indirectly recover from the state a substantive, independent claim, by way of set-off, any more than he could directly recover a debt due from the state by bringing a suit against it. He also cited The United States v. Giles, 9 Cranch, 212, 228, to the same effect.

tonment on the new road, were not provided for in the contract at a specific price; not at the price of fourteen cents, for they were not issued at any place on the old road between Nashville and Bear Creek, described in the contract; and not the price of eighteen and a half cents, for it was not sufficient that the cantonment should be in the Chickasaw and Choctaw country, but it must also be on the road between Bear Creek and Natchez existing at the time of the contract. The case, then, falls precisely within that clause of the articles of agreement, that provides, that the price of rations delivered at any other places not specified, shall be thereafter agreed on betwixt the public and the contractor; and this is the construction originally adopted by the government itself.

The same reasons which lead us to this conclusion, constrain us to adopt the construction, that the parties, in their contract, in referring to the Chickasaw and Choctaw country, intended not a disputed, imaginary, or rightful boundary afterwards to be settled, but the actual reputed boundary of that country. If, then, Fort Deposit was within the reputed boundary at the time of the contract, the line as afterwards settled by the treaty at Fort Adams, though the true line, has nothing to do with the case; and the rations deposited at Fort Deposit are to be paid for at the contract price of eighteen and a half cents a ration.

The second and third questions propounded by the Circuit Court, may be shortly answered. 143*] If *there be no specific price agreed upon in the contract for rations issued at any place, the contract leaves the price to be adjusted by the government and the contractor. It is to be the joint act of both parties, and not the exclusive act of either. If they cannot agree, then a reasonable compensation is to be allowed; and that reasonable compensation is to be proved by competent evidence, and settled by a jury, as in common cases; and the defendant upon such a trial, is at liberty to show that the sum allowed him by the Secretary of War is not a reasonable compensation.

The fourth question is, whether the defendant can be permitted to claim a credit for the sums due him, under the contract, in this suit. The answer may materially depend upon the true construction of the act of Congress of the 3d day of March, 1797, c. 74, providing for the more effectual settlement of accounts between the United States and public receivers. The third section of that act provides, that upon suits instituted against any person indebted to the United States, judgment shall be rendered at the return term, unless the defendant shall, in open court, make oath or affirmation, that he is equitably entitled to credits which had been previous to the commencement of the suit submitted to the consideration of the accounting officers of the treasury, and rejected, &c. The fourth section then provides, that in suits between the United States and individuals, no claim for a credit shall be admitted upon trial, but such as shall appear to have been presented to the accounting officers of the treasury for 144*] their *examination, and by them disallowed in whole or in part, unless it shall be proved to the satisfaction of the court, that the defendant is at the time of the trial in possession of vouchers not before in his power to procure, and that he was prevented from exhibiting a claim for such credit at the treasury by absence from the United States, or some unavoidable accident. The terms of these sections are very broad and comprehensive. The third section manifestly supposes, that not merely legal but equitable credits ought to be allowed to debtors of the United States by the proper officers of the treasury; and the fourth section prohibits no claims for any credits, which have been disallowed at the treasury, from being given in evidence by the defendant at the trial. There being no limitation as to the nature and origin of the claim for a credit which may be set up in the suit, we think it a reasonable construction of the act, that it intended to allow the defendant the full benefit at the trial of any credit, whether arising out of the particular transaction for which he was sued, or out of any distinct and independent transaction, which would constitute a legal or equitable set-off, in whole or in part, of the debt sued for by the United States. The object of the act seems to be to liquidate and adjust all accounts between the parties, and to require a judgment for such sum only, as the defendant in equity and justice should be proved to owe to the United States. If this be the true construction of the act, which we do not doubt, the defendant might well claim a credit in this suit for the sums due him, even if they had grown out of distinct and independent trans- *145 actions, for he is legally, as well as equitably, entitled to them. But even if this construction of the act were doubtful, upon the facts of this particular case, as far as we can gather them, we should have probably come to the same result.

This suit seems to have been brought by the United States for the money price of certain provisions received by the defendant under the articles of agreement. The real object of the suit is, therefore, to procure an account and settlement of that claim. It forms an item in the general account between the parties, like every other advance made by the government to the defendant; and, independent of any statute provision, the defendant would have a right to show that he had accounted for the value of such advance by delivering the equivalent provisions for which it was originally made. In this view, also, the fourth question might be answered in the affirmative.

The opinion of the court will be certified accordingly to the Circuit Court of Kentucky:

1. That under the contract marked B, the defendant is not entitled to the sums disallowed in the paper D, nor to the sums specifically charged in the first and second items of the paper C, which were disallowed by the treasury officers; but is entitled to the sum charged in the third item of the paper C, which was disallowed by the same officers, if Fort Deposit was within the reputed boundary of the Choctaw country.

*2. That the defendant is not entitled *146 to the first and second items in the paper C, on the ground that the place at which the rations were delivered is not specially provided for in the contract; but that he has a right to show that the sum allowed by the Secretary of War for those rations is not a reasonable compensation.

3. That upon such proof the defendant is entitled to a reasonable compensation for those rations, to be ascertained by the jury.

4. That the defendant ought to be permitted to claim a credit for the above sums due him in this suit.

YOUNG v. BRYAN ET AL.

The Circuit Court has jurisdiction of a suit brought by the indorsee of a promissory note, who is a citizen of one state, against the indorser, who is a citizen of a different state, whether a suit could be brought in that court by the indorsee, against the maker, or not.

No protest of a promissory note, or inland bill of exchange, is necessary.

ERROR to the Circuit Court of Tennessee.

This was an action of assumpsit, brought in the court below, by the defendants in error, citizens of Pennsylvania, against the plaintiff [147*] in error, a citizen *of Tennessee, as the indorser of a promissory note drawn by another citizen of Tennessee, and indorsed to the plaintiffs. The only questions in the cause were,

(1) Whether the court below had jurisdiction; and, (2) whether notice of protest was necessary to charge the indorser in this case. Judgment having been rendered against the defendant below, the cause was brought by writ of error to this court.

Mr. Eaton, for the plaintiff in error, (1) argued that under the 11th section of the judiciary act of 1789, c. 20, the court below had not jurisdiction. The decision of this court, in the cases of Montalet v. Murray,<sup>1</sup> and Turner v. The Bank of North America,<sup>2</sup> shows, that where jurisdiction does not attach between the drawer and drawee, assignment cannot give jurisdiction. The indorser can only transfer by the assignment, the rights and interest he possesses; as he had no right (he and the drawer being citizens of the same state) to sue in the federal court, he could not consequently create any such right by the assignment. It would amount to a creation of jurisdiction by consent, which the law does not warrant. The case of Slacum

v. Pomery,<sup>3</sup> went off on the ground of the want of notice. At any rate, that was a foreign bill, and perhaps within the operation of the 11th section of the judiciary act; it is, then, not authority in this case. In the language of the 11th section of the judiciary act, *his [*148] is a "suit to recover the contents of a promissory note in favor of an assignee," &c. The declaration contains but a single count, founded upon the assignment, non-payment, and consequent liability of the plaintiff in error. There is no count for money had and received; there is but a single count, and that is to recover the contents of the note, a chose in action, which is against the express provision of the act. There is no distinct, substantive contract, between the indorser and holder of the note; and, if there were any, it is not declared on. (2) No notice of protest was given. This was necessary to charge the indorser;<sup>4</sup> and the declaration should contain an averment of notice of protest.<sup>5</sup>

Mr. Sergeant, contra, (1) admitted, that where by the judiciary act, jurisdiction does not attach between the drawer and the payee of a note, assignment cannot give jurisdiction. Such, and no more, is the amount of the decisions referred to. If the payee of the note could not maintain a suit in the federal courts against the drawer, neither can the indorsee maintain a suit in the federal courts against the drawer. But the jurisdiction of the federal courts extends to the case of a suit brought by the indorsee against the indorser, being citizens of different states, whether a suit could have been there brought against the drawers or not. By the words of the act, a general jurisdiction is given, in terms, *embracing all cases where citizens of [*149] different states are parties. Being in conformity with the provisions of the constitution, and intended to secure to the suitor an impartial tribunal, it ought to be liberally construed. Out of this general grant, there is a particular exception, which ought not to be extended beyond its natural construction, but rather to be strictly taken, being against constitutional right; and if there be doubt, that interpretation should be given which is most favorable to the jurisdiction. The words are, "Nor shall any district, or circuit court, have cognizance of any suit to recover the contents of any promissory note, or other chose in action, in favor of an assignee, unless a suit might have been prosecuted in such court to recover the said contents, if no assignment had been made, except in case of foreign bills of exchange." These words necessarily import a recovery by an assignee, claiming through the medium of an assignment, of the same contents which might have been recovered by the assignor, if he had not assigned. They apply only to a derivative claim. If the payee should make a special indorsement to a citizen of the same state, and such indorsee should indorse the note to a citizen of a different state, the latter, perhaps, could not sue the first indorsee in the federal court, because he would be obliged to claim under the assignment, and in right to the assignor. But if the payee indorse the note to a citizen of a different state, there is a new contract entered into between the indorser and the indorsee, by the indorsement, and the indorsee would claim upon the footing 150*] of *that contract, without regard to the original engagement, except for the fact (upon which the liability of the indorsee arises), that the note has been dishonored. The contract is so entirely independent that the indorsee would be liable though the note were forged, or the drawer fictitious. The assignment, it is true, is the evidence of the contract, and in a certain sense, the foundation of his claim; but he does not claim through it nor under it, nor does he claim at all as assignee. In the case of a note payable to bearer, and transferable by delivery, it is believed there could be no doubt of the jurisdiction, in favor of a bona fide holder, being a citizen of a different state from the drawer, through whatever hands it might have passed in its course to him. He would claim in his own right, and not by assignment. In the case of a general indorsement, also transferable by delivery, and conferring upon the bona fide holder an original right of suit against the indorser, the court would have jurisdiction of a suit against the indorser, for the same reason. And in case of a special indorsement to a citizen of a different state, the argument, if possible, is still stronger. Neither of these is within the words of the act. The plain intention of the provision is effectuated by the construction contended for on the part of the defendants in error. The design of the exception was either to prevent colorable transfers for the purpose of giving jurisdiction, or to enable the party to a negotiable contract, to secure to himself the jurisdiction of the state courts. The interpretation contended for, does not interfere 151*] with these views. *It is in the power of the indorser to fix the jurisdiction, by making a special indorsement, as it is in the power of the drawer to escape the federal jurisdiction by making the note payable to a citizen of the same state. But as it must be admitted, that where the note is payable to a citizen of a different state, or being payable to bearer, comes into the hands of a citizen of a different state, the drawer may become subject to federal jurisdiction, it would seem to follow, conclusively, that the indorser (omitting to guard himself, and thereby voluntarily waiving the right) would also be liable. It may be remarked, in the particular case under consideration, that the note appears, from the evidence, to have been drawn, and, probably, indorsed for the very purpose of being delivered to the plaintiffs below, who were, and were known to be, citizens of Pennsylvania. (2) It appears fully in evidence, that notice of non-payment by the drawer, was in due time given to the indorser. This is all that was necessary to be done, no protest being required of a note or inland bill of exchange. Wheat. 6.

Mr. Chief Justice MARSHALL delivered the opinion of the court, that a suit may be brought in the Circuit Court by the indorsee against the indorser, whether a suit could be there brought against the drawer or not. In such a case, the indorser does not claim through an assignment. It is a new contract *enter- [*152] ed into by the indorser and indorsee, upon which the suit is brought; and if the indorsee is a citizen of a different state, he may bring an action against the indorser in the Circuit Court. As to the other objection insisted upon by the plaintiff in error, all that was incumbent upon the holder, was to give due notice to the indorser. No protest of a promissory note or inland bill of exchange is necessary.

THE BELLO CORRUNES.

THE SPANISH CONSUL, Claimant.

A foreign consul has a right to claim, or institute a proceeding, in rem, where the rights of property of his fellow-citizens are in question, without a special procurator from those for whose benefit he acts.

But a consul cannot receive actual restitution of the res in controversy, without a special authority from the particular individuals who are entitled.

A capture made by citizens of the United States of property belonging to subjects of a country in amity with the United States unlawful, wheresoever the capturing vessel may have been equipped, or by whomsoever commissioned; and the property thus captured, if brought within the neutral limits of this country, will be restored to the original owners.

Whatever difficulty there may be, under our municipal institutions, in punishing as pirates, citizens of the United States who take from a state at war with Spain, a commission to cruise against that power, contrary *to the 14th article of the Spanish [*153] treaty, yet there is no doubt that such acts are to be considered as piratical acts for all civil purposes, and the offending parties cannot appear, and claim in our courts the property thus taken.

It seems, that the terms, "a state with which the said king shall be at war," in the 14th article of the treaty, include the South American provinces which have revolted against Spain.

But, however this may be, the neutrality act of June, 1797, c. I., extends the same prohibition, with all its consequences, to a colony revolting, and making war against its parent country.

In the case of such an illegal capture, the property of the lawful owners cannot be forfeited, for a violation of the revenue laws of this country, by the captors, or by persons who have rescued the property from their possession.

The rights of salvage may be forfeited by spoliation, smuggling, or other gross misconduct of the salvors.

APPPEAL from the Circuit Court of Rhode Island.

This was the case of a Spanish vessel and cargo, stranded on Block Island, and there seized by the officers of the customs. An information on behalf of the United States, was filed in the District Court, against the property, as forfeited, for an alleged breach of the revenue laws. His Catholic Majesty's Vice Consul for the District of Rhode Island, interposed a claim on behalf of "certain subjects of the King of Spain," the original owners of the ship and cargo, which was bound on a voyage from the port of Tarragona, in Spain, to La Vera Cruz, and was taken off Cape St. Antonio, on the west end of the island of Cuba, on the 21st of March, 1818, by an armed vessel called the Puyerrdon, commanded by one James Barnes, sailing under Buenos Ayres colors, and asserting a right to make captures under the authority of the government of that place. Restitution to the original Spanish owners was claimed 154 *upon the ground that the capturing vessel had been equipped in the ports of this country, in violation of our neutrality. An allegation was also filed by Barnes, demanding restitution of the property to the captors, as having been taken, jure belli, on the high seas. Another claim was also filed by certain persons, part of the original crew of the Bello Corrunes, left on board after the capture, who asserted a claim for salvage, in case the property should be restored to the original Spanish owners, under the following circumstances. The master of the captured vessel, and all her crew except four, were taken out, and a prize-master and crew put on board from the Puyerrdon. Thus equipped, the Bello Corrunes cruised in company with the Puyerrdon nearly two months, during which period another Spaniard, of the original crew of the Bello Corrunes, was returned to that vessel. The two vessels afterwards separated, and on the 8th of May, in lat. 32° 30' north, and longitude 74° W. from London, the prize crew, assisted by the persons originally on board the Bello Corrunes, rose on the prize-master and other officers, and rescued the vessel from their possession. They then steered their course for the United States, and the vessel was by some means stranded upon Block Island, where the vessel and cargo were seized by the revenue officers.

A decree was entered in the District Court, pro forma, and by consent of parties, restoring the property to the original Spanish owners as claimed, and dismissing the other allegations and claims. This decree was affirmed, pro forma, and by consent, in *the [155 Circuit Court, and the cause was brought by appeal to this court.

It appeared by the evidence in the courts below, and by the further proof taken under a commission from this court, that the capturing vessel was formerly owned by citizens of the United States, and called the Mangoree, and was originally armed, equipped, and manned at Baltimore; and sailed from that port in March, 1817, under the command of Barnes, a citizen of the United States, domiciled in that city, under Buenos Ayres colors, on a cruise; and after capturing several Spanish vessels, proceeded to Buenos Ayres, where the vessel arrived in August, 1817.<sup>1</sup> The vessel was then altered from a schooner into a brig, and her name changed to The Puyerrdon, an addition of one gun was made to her armament, some of the original crew were re-shipped, and other seamen recruited.* An alleged sale of the vessel took place to one Higginbotham, a citizen of the United States, domiciled at Buenos Ayres; and a commission was issued by the Supreme Director of the United Provinces of South America, dated the 20th of November, 1817, authorizing Barnes to capture Spanish property; with which the vessel sailed from Buenos Ayres on the cruise, during which the present capture was made.

The Attorney-General, for the United States, argued, that the officers of the government being in *possession of this property, [156 would hold it as a droit until some person appeared duly authorized to claim it. The Consul of Spain has no authority to claim, in his own name, and in his official character, the property of persons to him unknown, and by whom he cannot therefore have been invested with a special procuration. He is not invested with a general authority for that purpose, virtute officii, nor is there evidence in this particular case that the consul is the agent, consignee, or correspondent of the owners, who are sometimes permitted to claim for their principal, when the latter is absent from the country.<sup>2</sup>

The passage cited from De Steck, is as follows:

"§ 27. Selon la règle par la plupart des traités de commerce et par l'usage presque généralement reçu les consuls sont les juges des gens de mer et des négocians et marchands de leur nation. (a)

§ 28. Il leur est ordinairement attribuée la juridiction tant en matière civile que criminelle.

§ 29. Cette juridiction attribuée aux consuls n'émane point de la puissance et de l'autorité du souverain, qui les établit, que n'a point de pouvoir sur ses sujets expatriés, demeurans, commerçans, établis en des pays étrangers. Elle depend et derive plutôt de la concession, de l'attribution du souverain de l'état où les consuls résident. Elle suppose donc toujours des traités par lesquels elle est stipulée, accordée, attribuée.

Great public inconveniences and mischief might
157*] *follow from allowing foreign consuls, not specially authorized by their own government, or by this, nor by the parties, to receive restitution of property, for which they may interpose a claim as belonging to their fellow-subjects. Supposing the property here to be devested out of the original owners by the capture, and vested in the captors, jure belli, it must be forfeited to the United States for violating the revenue laws, which was the original intention of the parties, and was partially accomplished at Block Island. Or supposing the recapture by the prize crew to be valid, they 158*] must be *considered as the agents of the original proprietors, and their misconduct must be visited upon the original proprietors.

Mr. Winder, for the appellants and captors, insisted, that the present capture being made on the high seas, jure belli, under a commission regularly issued by a government acknowledged to be entitled to exercise the rights of war against its enemy, could not be inquired into by the courts of this country; but that the captors being entitled to the possession, having only been dispossessed by the criminal misconduct of the prize crew which they had put on board to secure the prize, were entitled to restitution, in order to enable them to proceed against it as prize in the competent court. Whatever military means are directed, from within the territory of one of the belligerent states against its enemy, are not subject to the review or control of any neutral or other foreign tribunal or authority, except in the single case of a direct violation of the neutral territory itself. This principle grows out of the perfect independence and equality of nations, existing as it were in a state of nature in respect to each other. Their conduct in authorizing acts of war is no more reviewable by other nations, than any other of their acts of sovereignty.<sup>1</sup> It is this perfect independence and equality of sovereign states which is the sole foundation of the exclusive jurisdiction of the prize courts of the captor's country over everything done under 159*] a prize *commission.<sup>2</sup> In the celebrated case of The Exchange,<sup>3</sup> this court held, that the commission of a sovereign protected that vessel from all inquiry, notwithstanding the flagrantly unjust conduct of the French emperor in appropriating the property of an American citizen to his own use, without the form of a trial, and incorporating it into his military marine. It must be shown, that the act of the government of Buenos Ayres in granting this commission is unlawful, before it can be shown that any of the effects of that act are invalid. Suppose the Exchange, on her voyage, had made a capture, could this court have restored it to the former owners? Or could it inquire into the validity of such a capture consistently with the principles laid down in that case? The enlistment of men in neutral countries to serve the belligerent powers is lawful, unless there be some express prohibition of the neutral state. Such a municipal prohibition would certainly make it unlawful, in respect to the neutral state whose laws are violated; but it does not, therefore, follow, that all the acts of such persons in war would be unlawful, or that they are not entitled to the rights of lawful war.<sup>4</sup> The carrying of contraband is prohibited by the law of nations under the penalty of confiscation, and the exportation of contraband articles may be prohibited by the municipal code under other penalties; but such prohibition would not invalidate a *capt-[*160 ure made with the munitions of war thus exported. The government of this country naturalizes all foreigners indiscriminately, in peace and in war, and employs them in its land and naval service; and it is not for us to question the right of a citizen of the United States to enter into the military service of a foreign state. It is insisted, that not only the court has no authority by the law of nations to restore to the original owners a prize thus captured, but that the law of nations gives the congress no power to authorize the court to restore. The legislature may prohibit our citizens from enlisting in the service of the belligerents, or from fitting out ships to be employed in cruising, under ever so severe penalties; but those penalties cannot extend to a forfeiture of the rights of prize acquired under the commission of an independent sovereign state. Nor are Spain and the United States competent to regulate by their mutual treaty stipulations the sovereign rights of the South American provinces, though they may stipulate to inflict penalties in personam, for what they deem the criminal conduct of their subjects or citizens. As to the claim of the United States for a forfeiture on account of the alleged violation of the revenue laws, it is already settled by this court, that the property of foreigners cannot be forfeited for the misconduct of those who are tortiously in possession, as was the case here with the rescuers.<sup>5</sup>

*Mr. Webster and Mr. Wheaton, for [*161 the respondent and claimant, the Spanish Consul, (1) contended, that the consul, from the necessity of the case, had a right to interpose a claim for the property of his fellow-subjects, brought into our ports in this manner. He does not claim as attorney in fact, but his character is more like an attorney at law. There is no necessity of a special procuration from those for whom he claims, because it does not follow that the property will be actually delivered into his hands until the respective rights of the owners are determined, and a special authority produced from them to receive distribution. There is the more necessity for permitting the consul, as the official protector of the commercial rights and interests of his fellow-subjects in a foreign country, to interpose a claim in a case of this nature, because the usual term of a year and a day allowed in prize causes, where there is no claim, would not be allowed here, since the property is demanded by the captors under their pretended commission, and if the subjects of Spain, residing at a distance, and ignorant even of the fact of the capture, were not allowed to be represented by their consul, the property would be taken away by the captors, and irrevocably lost to the original owners. It will also frequently be impossible for the consul to specify the owners for whom he claims, and he ought, therefore, to be allowed to file allegations claiming it for Spanish subjects generally. The opinion of M. Portalis in the case of The Danish Consul,<sup>1</sup> proceeds on-

162* tively upon the peculiar *regulation of France, which makes the procureur-general, the official attorney of all persons who are not represented before the tribunals by any special procurator; which would, of course, render unnecessary the interposition of foreign consuls in cases where the rights of their countrymen were involved.

2. They argued, that the vessel by which the present capture was made, having been fitted out in the ports of the United States, and the capture having been made by our citizens, in violation of the law of nations, the acts of Congress, and the treaty with Spain, the property must be restored to the original owners, according to the uniform decisions of this court.<sup>2</sup> Under our municipal constitution, the treaty is the supreme law of the land; and it would be so by the law of nations without that constitutional provision. "Every treaty," says Sir W. Scott, "is a part of the private law of the country which has entered into that treaty, and is as binding on the subjects as any part of their municipal laws."<sup>3</sup> The 9th article of the Spanish treaty declares, that goods taken from pirates shall be restored to the lawful owners; and the 14th article declares the captors, in the present case, to be pirates, as it provides, that they shall be punished as such for taking a commission to cruise against Spain. And yet we are inquiring whether they are entitled to 163* restitution *of the very property which they have thus piratically taken. It may be admitted, that in some cases citizens of one country may lawfully engage in the wars of another; we may take the doctrine cited from Bynkershoek, that they may enlist where there is no prohibition. It may also safely be admitted, that as far as the other belligerents are concerned in their hostile relations with each other, it is lawful war. Spain cannot justly complain of the South American provinces for employing foreigners in their service. And if the capturing ship were a national vessel, like the Exchange,<sup>4</sup> no doubt her commission would estop all judicial inquiry into her conduct. But this is a private claim. The original Spanish owners claim nothing against the government of Buenos Ayres. That government claims nothing of the Spanish owners. Our own citizens assert a claim to this property acquired in war, which can only be maintained upon the supposition that they may be at war whilst their country is at peace; that they are not bound by the laws and treaties of their own country; that they may expatriate themselves, flagrante bello, for the purpose of committing hostilities against nations in amity with the United States. If the doctrine contended for on the part of the captors, that the commission is conclusive, be correct, then the court can never look behind it, and the belligerents may dispense with our laws, and the allegiance of our citizens, at their pleasure. The case of Talbot v. Janson,<sup>5</sup> whatever may be thought *of it in other respects, has never been [*164 overruled as to the principle, that the neutral tribunals have a right to inquire into the validity of a captor's commission, to see whether it was obtained and used in violation of the laws of the neutral country. That case has been made the basis of a series of decisions, which have become the settled law of this court, and which it is now too late to question. The court has uniformly treated it as a necessary consequence of the personal illegality of the act of taking the commission that the property captured under it should be restored to the lawful owner. It is, therefore, immaterial where, or by whom, the capturing vessel was equipped. It is sufficient, that the capturing persons are citizens of the United States, and cannot assert a right of property founded on their own illegal conduct.

3. But even admitting that the original capture was legal, the prize cannot now be reclaimed by the captors. An interest acquired in war by possession, is lost with the possession. The rights of capture are completely divested by recapture, escape, or rescue.<sup>6</sup> Here the property has been divested out of the possession of the captors by the rescuers, for the benefit of the original owners, and the rescuers hold it in trust for their benefit.

Mr. Wheaton, for the salvors, stated, that the original *owners being thus shown [*165 to be entitled to restitution, the next question would be, whether the salvors were entitled to any, and what salvage. Unless the property were thus restored to the Spanish owners, the rescuers could not claim any salvage; for certainly the captors would not admit that any meritorious service had been rendered them by the rescue. But, as against the former owners, the rescuers have a just claim, having saved the property from the grasp of their enemy; and it would be idle to send the salvors to the courts of Spain, to prosecute their claim, since the possession of the property enables this court to do complete justice between all the parties.<sup>7</sup> And this court has already determined, that in a case of derelict by one belligerent, a neutral is entitled to salvage, and the courts of the neutral country into which the property is brought, have authority to award it.<sup>8</sup> As to the quantum of salvage: one-third was allowed in that case; and it was doubted whether more ought not to have been allowed, if the salvors had appealed. The case of The Adventure,<sup>9</sup> which was a donation at sea by the belligerent captor to a neutral, who brought the property into a port of his own country, was held to be a lawful salvage, and a moiety was allowed. case of Rowe et al. v. The Brig —, which was a Spanish vessel captured by a South American cruiser, one of the learned judges of 166*] this *court allowed a moiety of the net value.<sup>1</sup> And in general, it may be affirmed that there is no inflexible rule, either in cases of derelict, or of rescue; a reasonable salvage, proportioned to the meritorious exertions of the salvors, is to be decreed; but never less than a third, unless the property is very valuable, or the services rendered very inconsiderable.<sup>2</sup>

Mr. Webster, contra, upon the claim for salvage, insisted, that it appeared by the evidence that there had been a partial embezzlement of the property by the alleged salvors, and that it was a fixed rule that such misconduct, or any circumstance of fraud, forfeited the rights of salvage.<sup>3</sup>

Mr. Justice JOHNSON delivered the opinion of the court:

This vessel was stranded on Block Island, in an alleged effort to reach a port of the United States. The vessel and cargo have been seized by the collector of Newport, for supposed violations of the trade laws of this country, and an information was accordingly filed, to subject the whole to condemnation, in the District Court for Rhode Island District.

This claim of the United States has been opposed by three classes of competitors. The 167*] vessel and *cargo, it appears, are Spanish property, and were captured on the southwestern coast of Cuba, by the Puyerrdon, a private armed brig, bearing the flag of the Buenos Ayrean republic, and commanded by Captain James Barnes. Being armed, and well calculated for a privateer, she was manned with a complement of the privateer's men, about thirty in number, and her original commander, and all except four of the Spanish crew, removed. Thus equipped, it appears, that she cruised, as a tender to the Puyerrdon, for about two months, during which time another Spaniard was added to her crew, and on the 8th May, when in lat. 32, 30, N. and long. 74, from London, the crew rose upon the officers, subdued them, put them on board the first vessel they met with, and steered their course for this continent.

Thus circumstanced, Capt. Barnes has libeled in behalf of the captors, the Spanish Vice-Consul in behalf of the original Spanish owners, and the crew of the Bello Corrunes have libeled for a compensation by way of salvage, to which they supposed themselves entitled, in the event of restitution being decreed to the original owners.

To these several claims it is objected on behalf of the United States, that restitution cannot be decreed to the Spanish Vice-Consul because he is not in that capacity a competent party in court to assert the rights of individual subjects; nor, in favor of the captors, because the privateer was originally fitted out in the United States, and is still owned by American citizens; nor, in favor of the salvors, because *they have forfeited their claim to sal- [168 vage by spoliation, and an attempt to smuggle.

As these suggestions open the whole case, it shall be disposed of by considering them severally in their order, only remarking, en passant, that though they are all sustained, it would avail the United States nothing: since, without evidence sufficient to sustain the criminal charge, it would only follow that the proceeds of the property libeled must lie in the registry of the court until a proper claimant shall make his appearance.

On the first point made by the Attorney-General, this court feels no difficulty in deciding, that a vice-consul duly recognized by our government, is a competent party to assert or defend the rights of property of the individuals of his nation, in any court having jurisdiction of causes affected by the application of international law. To watch over the rights and interests of their subjects, wherever the pursuits of commerce may draw them, or the vicissitudes of human affairs may force them, is the great object for which consuls are deputed by their sovereigns; and in a country where laws govern, and justice is sought for in courts only, it would be a mockery to preclude them from the only avenue through which their course lies to the end of their mission. The long and universal usage of the courts of the United States, has sanctioned the exercise of this right, and it is impossible that any evil or inconvenience can flow from it. Whether the powers of the vice-consul shall in any instance extend to the right to receive, in his national character, *the [169 proceeds of property libeled and transferred into the registry of a court, is a question resting on other principles. In the absence of specific powers given him by competent authority, such a right would certainly not be recognized. Much, in this respect, must ever depend upon the laws of the country from which, and to which, he is deputed. And this view of the subject will be found to reconcile the difficulties supposed to have been presented by the authorities quoted on this point. Considering, then, the original Spanish interest as legally represented, the questions are, whether that interest is not forfeited to the United States, or superseded by the superior claims of the capturing vessel.

This is not the ordinary case of a capture made under the taint of an illegal outfit. The decision of this court must rest upon a very different principle. In those cases, the national character of the claimant is immaterial. He has violated the neutrality of this country, and cannot shelter himself under his commission, or his allegiance, however unquestionable his right, individual or national, would have been otherwise. But can a citizen of this country, who has violated its laws, ever be recognized in our courts as a legal claimant of the fruits of his own wrong? We are of opinion he cannot; and it therefore becomes material to determine what is the national character of the claimants, under the capture made by the Puyerrdon.

At the time of this vessel's first sailing from Baltimore, she was unquestionably American owned and commanded. During the time of her cruising *under the name of the [170 Mangoree, it is not pretended that she changed owners. The legality of her conduct at that period has been defended altogether on the ground of her taking the flag of Buenos Ayres, being commissioned in a foreign state, and her commander, Barnes, assuming the character of a citizen of the power that had commissioned him. It is not until her arrival at Buenos Ayres, in 1817, that any change of property in the vessel has been set up in proof. At that time, it is contended, she was set up at auction, and changed owners, passing into the hands of a Mr. Higginbotham, a citizen of the United States, married and domiciled at Buenos Ayres.

If this fact had been satisfactorily made out in evidence, it would have drawn this court into the consideration of some questions of great nicety, which have never yet received a solemn adjudication in this court. But the evidence to support this pretended change of property is so wholly unsatisfactory, that the court rejects it; for, the ordinary solemnities of such transfers are too well known to admit the belief that in this instance the change of property, had it been real, would not have been effected or commemorated by written documents.

This court, then, proceeds upon the assumption that the Puyerrdon is still, in reality, American owned, and they are also of opinion, that she must be held to be American commanded; since even if the doctrine could be admitted, that a man's allegiance may be put off with his coat, it is very clear that Mr. Barnes' citizenship is altogether in fraud of the laws of his own country. His family has never been 171* removed from Baltimore, and his home has been always either there or upon the ocean.

The question then is, whether thus circumstanced, the claim in behalf of the owners and mariners of the Puyerrdon can be sustained.

We are decidedly of opinion it cannot.

By the 2d section of the 14th article of the treaty with Spain, "Citizens, subjects or inhabitants" of the United States, are strictly prohibited from taking "any commission or letter of marque, for arming any ship or vessel, to act as privateers against the subjects of His Catholic Majesty, or the property of any of them, from any prince or state with which the said king shall be at war." And it is further provided, "that if any person of either nation shall take such commissions or letters of marque, he shall be punished as a pirate."

Whatever difficulties there may exist under the free institutions of this country, in giving full efficacy to the provisions of this treaty, by punishing such aggressions as acts of piracy, it is not to be questioned that they are prohibited acts, and intended to be stamped with the character of piracy; and to permit the persons engaged in the open prosecution of such a course of conduct, to appear, and claim of this court the prizes they have seized, would be to countenance a palpable infraction of a rule of conduct, declared to be the supreme law of the land.

Some doubts have been suggested on the use of the words "state at war" with Spain. This court would not readily lean to favor a 172* stricted construction of language, as applied to the provisions of a treaty, which always combines the characteristics of a contract, as well as a law; but it is not necessary to examine the grounds of these doubts, as applied to the present case; because this treaty has been enforced by the provisions of the act of Congress of the 14th June, 1797, so as to leave no doubt of its extension to the case of cruising against Spain, under a commission from the new states formed in her colonies.

Citizens of the United States, therefore, present themselves to this court to demand restitution of a prize which they had made in violation of the most solemn stipulations of a treaty, and provisions of a law of their own country, and of which they have been dispossessed by their own associates in guilt. Under such circumstances, this court cannot hesitate to reject the claim, and adjudge the property to the original proprietors.

This view of the subject obviates the necessity of examining the reality and effect of the alleged rescue on behalf of the original owners, with a view to the question of restitution; but it still becomes necessary, with a view to the question of forfeiture, and the merit of the alleged salvors. With regard to the former, it is very clear, that supposing the rescue to have been real and complete, the Spanish consul ought not to be precluded from his election, whether to put his claim upon the ground, that the interest of those whom he represents was never legally divested, or that it was afterwards legally recovered. In the one case, there is no ground for affecting it with the [*173] forfeiture, because of the conduct of the crew; and in the other, some question may be made, how far the property was affected by the illegal acts of those who, at that time, held in the right of the owners. But even in this latter view of the state of the property, we are of opinion, that the forfeiture was not incurred; since, although it be supposed that the property was in custody of those who held for the Spanish owners, it was not held by those to whom the Spanish owners had entrusted the vessel and cargo. And this is the only ground upon which the acts of the ship's company are made to produce forfeitures of the interest of shippers or ship-owners. For, besides the considerations drawn from the great predominance of the force detached from the privateer, in the effort to recapture, the few men of her own crew were gratuitous actors. Their contract with the owners had ceased, and they assumed the character of voluntary agents, whose conduct the owners might or might not adopt, according to their own views or interests.

As to the claims of the salvors, it may be remarked, that maritime courts always approach them with great benignity and favor. Yet, in proportion to the inclination to favor where there is merit, is the indignation with which they view every indication of a disposition to take advantage of the unfortunate. Spoliation, and even gross neglect, may forfeit all the pretensions of salvors to compensation.

In the case before us, it is not too much to pronounce the claim of those of the crew of the Puyerrdon who libel for salvage, to [*174] be not only groundless but impudent; for, besides spoliation, smuggling, and the grossest irregularities, it is perfectly clear, from the pilot's evidence, that they run the vessel on shore purposely. So that whatever may have been the reality of their benevolent designs towards the Spanish owners originally, their subsequent conduct not only casts a doubt over their candor, but divests them of all pretensions to compensation.

Nor do the five Spaniards who composed a part of the crew of the Bello Corrunes, at the time she was stranded, and who were not of the capturing crew, escape being involved in the suspicions which fasten on their associates.

It is a melancholy truth, too well known to this court, that the instruments used in the predatory voyages carried on under the colors of the South American states, are among the most abandoned and profligate of men. Under the influence of strong interests or fears, the mind of man too often yields, even where the moral sense still exerts its influence; but hold out to one of these practiced adventurers in a course of plunder, the hope of gain on the one hand, and the fear of imprisonment for piracy on the other, and what are the chances for truth?

That these men were selected from the Spanish crew to associate with those of the capturing vessel, is a circumstance not very favorable to their characters and conduct, and it would require some strong evidence of their innocence to remove from them the suspicion of a voluntary association with the enemies of their king. Joining in, or even setting on foot 175* or promoting the recapture (facts which rest wholly on their own veracity), can prove very little in their favor, since such mutinies are become every-day occurrences whenever such a crew find themselves in possession of a valuable cargo. Nor will the inference in their favor be very strong from their resorting to the consul of their country, since it was the only course which held out a chance of gain, or of escape from the imputation both of piracy and smuggling. There is no evidence to separate their conduct from a complete identification with the rest of the crew, except what is obtained from their own testimony. Yet it is suggested, that they may still make their innocence and merits to appear; and as the parties have signified their consent that the case may be opened in the court below as to this class of salvors, the case will be remanded to the Circuit Court, for further proceedings, so far as the claim for salvage is concerned.

Decree accordingly.

DECREE.—This cause came on to be heard on the transcript of the record of the Circuit Court for the District of Rhode Island, and was argued by counsel. On consideration whereof, it is ordered and decreed, that the decree of the said Circuit Court in this case be, and the same is hereby affirmed, with costs, against Barnes and others, except so far as relates to the libel for salvage of Emanuel Rodriguez, Emanuel Josef, Emanuel Barbarus, Antonio Josef, and 176* Josef Isnages, who formed no part of the crew of the private armed brig Puyerrredon; and as to so much of the said decree as relates to the said libelants, Emanuel Rodriguez and others, it is further decreed and ordered, by consent of parties, by their counsel, that the decree of the said Circuit Court be, and the same is hereby reversed and annulled. And it is further ordered, that the said cause be remanded to the said Circuit Court for farther inquiry; and that the proceeds of the said Bello Corrunes and cargo lie in the registry of the said Circuit Court, to be paid over, under the order of that court, to the Spanish owners, as interest shall be made to appear.

[INSURANCE.]

v.

UNIVERSAL INSURANCE COMPANY.

Where, in a policy of insurance, a technical total loss is asserted as the ground of recovery, the loss must be occasioned by the immediate operation of some of the perils insured against, and it is not sufficient that the voyage be abandoned for fear of the operation of the peril.

The insurers do not undertake, that the voyage shall be performed without delay, or that the perils insured against shall not occur; they undertake only for losses sustained by those perils; and if any peril does begin to act upon the subject, yet if it be removed before any loss takes place, and the voyage is not thereby broken up, but is, or may be, resumed, the insured cannot abandon for a total loss.

Insurance on munitions of war, laden on board a neutral vessel, on a voyage from New [*177] York, to and at a port or ports, place or places, in the Gulf of Mexico, from the Balize to Campeachy, both inclusive, and from either back to New York, &c., with a memorandum, that the insurers should be free from any loss arising from illicit or prohibited trade. The goods insured were prohibited from being imported into the ports of New Spain, in possession of the Royalists, by the laws of Old Spain, but were permitted to be introduced into such ports as were in possession of the Insurgents. The vessel and cargo arrived off a place in possession of the patriot General Mina, and the master made an agreement to sell the cargo to him, deliverable from time to time, as he should want it, at St. Ander. But before the cargo could be delivered, the vessel was chased off by Spanish armed ships, and after making several attempts to return, was compelled to proceed to the Balize for repairs; after which she again approached the coast, but found it still in possession of the Royalists, General Mina having retired into the interior. The objects of the voyage being thus defeated, the vessel returned to New York with the original cargo on board; and the insured then abandoned to the underwriters, not having before had information of the breaking up of the voyage. Held, that the insured were not entitled to recover as for a total loss of the voyage.

ERROR to the Circuit Court of Maryland.

This was an action of covenant on a policy of insurance, underwritten by the defendants for the plaintiffs, on the 4th of February, 1817, on a voyage at and from New York, to and at a port or ports, place or places, in the Gulf of Mexico, from the Balize to Campeachy, both inclusive, and from either back to New York, or a port of discharge in the United States, upon all kinds of lawful goods and merchandises laden, or to be laden, on board the schooner Ellen Tooker. In another part of the policy, it is stated to be "on cargo, consisting chiefly of munitions of war." There [*178] is a memorandum also in the policy, whereby the underwriters are warranted by the assured free from any charge, damage, or loss, which may arise in consequence of a seizure or detention of the property for or on account of any illicit or prohibited trade. The declaration alleges, that the vessel, with the cargo, proceeded on the voyage, and asserts as a loss within the contract, that while on the voyage, the schooner, with her cargo, was restrained and detained by certain persons acting under the authority of the King of Spain, whereby the goods and merchandises became wholly lost.

The material facts, as they appeared on the trial, are these. The Ellen Tooker, having on board property of the plaintiff of a greater value than the sum insured, sailed from New York, on the voyage insured, on the 31st of January, 1817. On the 25th of February she arrived at the Balize, where the master left the vessel and went to New Orleans, and having obtained information, that Nantla and Talacuta were in possession of the Independents, to which places American vessels might proceed, on his return to the Balize, the schooner proceeded for Nantla, and arrived off that place on the 23d of March, and found it in possession of the Royalists. The schooner then proceeded to Talacuta, and having arrived off that place, a boat was sent ashore for information, the crew of which were made prisoners. Concluding from this occurrence, that the place was in possession of the Royalists, the schooner put to sea, and on the 5th of April fell in with 179*] a fleet *of six sail under the command of General Mina, with troops on board, bound for the bar of St. Ander. The master having had communication with General Mina, and received encouragement from him that he would purchase the cargo, the schooner kept company with the fleet, and arrived off the bar of St. Ander on the 28th of April, where the schooner came to anchor in the open sea, the entrance being too shoal to permit her to cross the bar. On the 11th of May, the master left the schooner and went up the river to Porto La Marina (where General Mina had his headquarters), for the purpose of selling the cargo, which he accordingly did, deliverable to General Mina, as he should want it, from time to time, at St. Ander, the whole delivery to be completed by the first of July. On the 18th of May, while the master was on shore, a Spanish frigate and two armed schooners of the Royalists hove in sight, and the schooner was immediately gotten under way for the purpose of escaping them, and after four hours' chase effected her escape. The schooner made several attempts to return, but was prevented by Spanish ships hovering about the place; on the 26th of May, finding the coast clear, she returned to St. Ander, which was still in possession of the Independents, and the master was taken on board. The foremast of the schooner being found to be loose in the step and injured, and the crew being short of water, the schooner proceeded to the mouth of the Rio Grande for water and to examine the foremast; and there the heel of the foremast being found to be gone, the schooner proceeded to the Balize 180*] *for repairs, and arrived there on the sixth of June. The foremast was there repaired, and the schooner sailed again for St. Ander for the purpose of delivering the cargo to General Mina according to contract, and on her arrival there, on the 22d of June, the place was found to be in possession of the Royalists, who occupied it with a military force. In consequence of this, the schooner did not approach the shore, but proceeded along the coast northward to a place called Pass Cavellos, about 270 miles from St. Ander, where information was received that St. Ander, and the coast, were completely in possession of the Royalists. The objects of the voyage being in this manner defeated, the schooner returned to New York with her original cargo on board, and arrived there on the 22d of July, 1817. The plaintiffs had no intelligence of the breaking up of the voyage until the return of the schooner to New York, and then abandoned to the underwriters in due time, assigning as a cause, that the Ellen Tooker was "compelled, by an armed force, to leave St. Ander in the Gulf of Mexico, where she had arrived and was about to deliver her cargo, and was prevented thereafter by a like force from re-entering that place." This abandonment was not accepted. It was also in evidence, that the cargo of the Ellen Tooker was shipped, and intended to be sold to the Independent party of Mexico, which was waging war with the King of Spain, and that the same was prohibited from importation into Mexico by the laws of Spain, and would have been seized and confiscated if it had been carried into any of the ports in *possession of the Royalists, but would [*181 have been freely admitted into any ports in possession of the Independent party.

Upon these facts a verdict was given, and judgment rendered for the defendants, and the cause was brought to this court by writ of error.

Mr. Winder and Mr. Raymond, for the plaintiffs, stated, that this was an action of covenant on a policy of insurance, and that the breach assigned in the declaration was a loss occasioned by the restraint and detention of certain persons acting under the authority of the King of Spain. The voyage was broken up and destroyed by the constraint imposed upon the vessel to leave St. Ander, in order to avoid capture by the Spanish armed ships. The insurers were apprised of the nature of the risk. The port of St. Ander became the destination, and the vessel was prevented from entering it, by the risks insured against. This is a restraint within the meaning of the policy. Every restraint or control exerted by a people, prince or state, over the subject-matter insured, so as to defeat the voyage, is a loss within the policy. Such are the restraints of a blockade;<sup>1</sup> an embargo, limited in point of time, or indefinite;<sup>2</sup> and the municipal law of a *country which [*182 subjects the vessel and cargo to confiscation, if it is morally certain that it applies to the vessel, and would be enforced.<sup>3</sup> So, if the port of destination be shut, by being in possession of an enemy, or by interdiction of trade, it is a just cause for breaking up the voyage.<sup>4</sup> There is a great apparent discrepancy in the English authorities as to "restraint of princes." But this court has settled the import and meaning of the term in the case of Olivera v. The Union Insurance Company.<sup>1</sup> But it may be said that there is no proof that the blockade existed at the time of the abandonment. To which it is answered, that this principle does not apply to a technical total loss produced by blockade. In the case of an embargo or capture, the voyage is not necessarily broken up; it is merely suspended; but in that of a blockade, it is entirely defeated, and the object of the voyage cannot be accomplished. Though the restraint now under consideration is not that of a blockade, yet it is equivalent; since the master was prevented by the restraint from entering the port which he had selected, within the limits prescribed by the policy. A reasonable fear of loss by capture, seizure, &c., is a justifiable cause of deviation, and consequently protects against all losses arising from deviation. In 183*] the case of Schmidt v. United Insurance Company, it is said to be "sufficient to justify the master's conduct in cases of this kind, if he have good reason to apprehend that a capture will be the consequence of going on."<sup>2</sup>

Mr. Pinkney and Mr. D. B. Ogden, contra, argued, that in order to establish a technical total loss in this case, the insured must show a restraint within the policy and declaration; and that it actually produced the breaking up of the voyage. The onus probandi is on the plaintiffs, and they must trace the supposed consequences of the peril home to its efficient cause. The insurance was on munitions, contraband of war; but the memorandum that the underwriters were not to be liable for a loss by illicit trade, secured them against any loss by mere municipal regulations. They have nothing to do with an internal conflict, by which the port may change masters. The declaration alleges a loss by restraint of princes. But this restraint must be the direct and immediate agent in breaking up the voyage; as in an embargo, or blockade, which being removed, the peril instantly ceases. Here the restraint was not only not the efficient cause of the loss, but it arose out of illicit traffic. This part of the coast of Mexico did not cease to be subject to the colonial code of Spain, by the temporary possession of the insurgents. The vessel attempted 184*] to escape, not merely from the *ordinary peril of capture in war, but from that combined with the local prohibition. It was a loss from a fear, which, had it been realized, would not have made the underwriters liable. All the quia timet cases, are cases where they would be so liable. The attempt is to make the underwriters find a lawful market; whereas the insured stipulates to take that upon himself by his warranty. Even if the market were lawful for a time, its ceasing to be so is not at the risk of the underwriters. So that the insured have broken up the voyage for a technical total loss, arising from perils not insured against.

Mr. Justice Story delivered the opinion of the court, and, after stating the facts, proceeded as follows:

1.—3 Wheat. Rep. 183.

2.—Per Livingston, J., 1 Johns. Rep. 262, and Targa. Ponderaz, c. 59, 291; Casaregis, Disc. 83, No. 84, cited by him. See also 1 Emerig. des Assur. 509. Wheat. 6.

Upon these facts, the Circuit Court directed the jury that the plaintiffs were not entitled to recover; and the propriety of this direction is the question before us upon this writ of error.

Two points have been argued at the bar: 1. That there was no actual restraint of persons acting under the authority of Spain, whereby the voyage was defeated. 2. That if a technical total loss took place by the loss of the voyage, it was a loss occasioned by engaging in an illicit and prohibited trade, for which, by the memorandum in the policy, the underwriters are not liable.

The declaration and the abandonment, both tie up the case to a total loss of the voyage, by the restraint of Spanish authorities. If this case be not made out in proof, there is an end of the controversy.

*In cases of this sort, where a technical total loss is asserted as a ground of recovery, it is not sufficient that the voyage has been entirely frustrated and lost; but the loss must be occasioned by some peril actually insured against. The peril must act directly, and not circuitously, upon the subject of the insurance. It must be an immediate peril, and the loss the proper consequence of it; and it is not sufficient that the voyage be abandoned, for fear of the operation of the peril.

The plaintiffs rely upon the fact of the Ellen Tooker's being chased away from St. Ander, and being prevented for several days from returning to that place by the presence of Spanish armed ships as decisive proof of actual restraint. But the voyage was delayed only, and not broken up by this occurrence, for the vessel afterwards returned in safety to St. Ander. The insurers do not undertake that the voyage shall be performed without delay, or that the perils insured against shall not occur; they undertake only for losses sustained by those perils; and if any peril does act upon the subject, yet if it be removed before any loss takes place, and the voyage be not thereby broken up, but is, or may be resumed, the insured cannot abandon for a total loss. If a vessel be captured during a voyage, and afterwards be recaptured, and performs, or may perform it, there can be no abandonment after the recapture, for a technical total loss. In the present case, the vessel actually did resume her voyage after the restraint ceased; and there is no evidence to show that any object of the voyage was defeated by this temporary *restraint and de- [*186 lay to avoid capture. Then, what was the real cause of the final destruction of the voyage? It was, that St. Ander, which but for a short time was in the possession of the troops of General Mina, was, in transitu, again occupied by the Royalists, and the colonial government resumed its functions. A trade was inhibited with that place, by the ordinary colonial laws of Spain; and the voyage itself, in which the Ellen Tooker was engaged, placed her, and her cargo also, in the character of an enemy. It was clear, therefore, that a proceeding into St. Ander, would have subjected the Ellen Tooker to confiscation for a double cause; for breach of the ordinary laws of trade, and for a violation of neutral duties. The voyage, then, was broken up from fear of loss, by reason of the seizure and confiscation of the property. It was abandoned by the master quia timebat, and not because there was any actual direct restraint, which prevented the vessel from proceeding to the port of destination. The case, therefore, falls directly within the authority of the cases of Hadkinson v. Robinson (3 Bos. & Pull., 388), and Lubbock v. Rousecroft (5 Esp. R., 50), which have never been shaken. In the former case, Lord Alvanley said, "any loss which necessarily arises from capture or detention of princes, is a loss within the policy; but here the captain, learning that if he entered the port of destination, the vessel would be liable to confiscation, avoided that port, whereby the object of the voyage is defeated. This does not operate to the total destruction of the thing insured." There are 187 precisely the same circumstances *in the case now at bar. The underwriter does not warrant that the vessel shall have a right, to trade at the port of destination; but only that notwithstanding the perils insured against, the vessel shall proceed to such port. If the plaintiffs, in the events which have occurred, were entitled to abandon and recover, as for a technical total loss, they would have been entitled to abandon for the same cause at the time of the vessel's sailing from New York on the voyage; for St. Ander was at that time just as much shut against the vessel, and she was just as liable to confiscation for illegal traffic with that place, as she was at the time the voyage was broken up.

It is the unanimous opinion of the court, that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed, with costs.

SAVAGE, Claimant.

A question of fact, under the 46th section of the collection law of the 2d March, 1799, c. 128, exempting from duty the wearing apparel, and other personal baggage, of persons arriving in the United States.

Where the res gesta, in a revenue cause, are incapable of explanation consistently with the innocence of the party, condemnation follows, although there be no positive testimony of the offense having been committed. Circumstances are sometimes more convincing than the most positive evidence. 188 *Although a mere intention to evade the payment of duties be not, per se, a cause of forfeiture, yet when a question arises whether an act has been committed which draws after it that consequence, such intention will justify the court in not putting on the conduct of the party, in respect to the act in question, an interpretation as favorable as under other circumstances it would be disposed to do.

A PPEAL from the Circuit Court of South Carolina.

This cause was argued by Mr. Winder and Mr. Raymond for the appellant and claimant, and by the Attorney-General for the United States.

Mr. Justice LIVINGSTON delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a libel for an alleged forfeiture under the 46th section of the collection law, passed the 2d of March, 1799.

This section exempts from duty the wearing apparel, and other personal baggage, of those persons who arrive in the United States; and to ascertain what articles are to be exempted, it is directed that due entry thereof, as of other goods, but separate and distinct therefrom, shall be made with the collector, by the owner or his agent, verified by oath, stating, among other things, that the packages, mentioned in such entry, contain no goods whatever, except the wearing apparel and other personal baggage of the person to whom they belong. And it is provided, that whenever any article subject to duty, shall be found among such baggage, which shall not be mentioned to the collector at the time such entry is made they shall be forfeited, and the person in *whose bag- [189 gage they shall be found, shall, moreover, forfeit and pay treble the value of such articles.

These proceedings commenced in the District Court of the District of South Carolina, and after sentences of condemnation in that court, and in the Circuit Court of the United States for that district, the claimant has appealed to this court.

The only question we have to decide, is, whether the goods libeled, and which are admitted to be subject to duty, were entered as baggage or not. If they were, they must be condemned; if not, the claimant is entitled to restitution.

The claimant insists that the trunks seized were not included in her baggage entry, and that no act of hers, prior or subsequent to the entry, shows that it was her intention to cover them by it. Her baggage entry comprised "seven trunks wearing apparel, sundry band-boxes and bedding, for Mrs. Savage and family, passengers in the ship Robert Edwards." Under this entry, and a permit given in conformity with it, the claimant took away several trunks and band-boxes, the contents of some of which do not appear, but she alleges that they contained only baggage, and no dutiable article, and that she never demanded the trunks in question as part of those mentioned in the entry of her baggage. Some reliance is also placed on the fact, that before any seizure, these trunks were regularly entered by the master, and the duties on them secured, or paid. Whether they were thus entered or not, can have no influence on the present question, which is confined to the single inquiry, whether they had, previous *to such act on the [190 part of the master, been entered by the owner as part of her baggage. For, no act of the master, subsequent to such entry, could relieve them from the forfeiture which in that case had previously attached.

It will be sufficient to advert to a few of the prominent facts, to ascertain the real character of this transaction. The court has been reminded that it ought not, without the most satisfactory and positive proof, in a case so highly penal, to decide that a violation of law has been committed. Although such proof may generally be desirable, we are not to shut our eyes on circumstances which sometimes carry with them a conviction which the most positive testimony will sometimes fail to produce. And if such circumstances cannot well consist with the innocence of the party, and arise out of her own conduct, and remain unexplained, she cannot complain if she be the victim of them. No extraordinary prudence or circumspection on the part of the claimant was necessary to have avoided the unpleasant predicament in which she is placed. If she had brought these goods on board in London, as cargo; if she had paid freight for them as such; if she had desired them to be placed on the manifest of the cargo, which she was most probably apprised was necessary; if, when she entered her other merchandise imported in the same vessel, she had also entered these; if, after making her baggage entry, she had distinguished or informed the inspector which of the trunks contained her baggage, and which were 191*] filled with merchandise, the whole *of the present difficulty would have been avoided. The claimant neglecting to take any one of these precautions, which could not have been the effect of ignorance, as it appears she is occasionally engaged in the importation of goods in the line of her business, leads, irresistibly, to the conclusion, that she intended to land those trunks without the payment of duties, and that this end was to be effected under the disguise of entering them as baggage and wearing apparel. Although a mere intention to evade such payment be no cause of forfeiture, yet when a question arises, whether an act has been committed which draws after it this consequence, such intention will assist in dispelling some of the doubts in which the act itself might otherwise be involved, and will justify a court in not putting on the conduct of the party, in relation to the act in question, an interpretation as favorable as under other circumstances it would feel disposed to do. Thus, in the case before us, the claimant wishes us to believe, that the seven trunks of wearing apparel, and the band-boxes, which were included in her baggage entry, were all of them actually landed under her permit; and that, therefore, the five trunks which remained on board, and were seized as composing part of her baggage entry, were not comprised in it. But is this made out with any reasonable certainty? On the contrary, is there any evidence whatever on which we can come to a satisfactory conclusion, that seven trunks, which was the number entered by her as baggage, were actually landed before the seizure. What the 192*] *claimant herself considered as band-boxes, and actually represented as such to the inspector, she now desires may be converted into trunks. Unless this can be done, which would be to disbelieve the whole evidence in the cause, there is no pretense for saying that all the trunks entered by her as baggage had been landed. The marks on the trunks do not furnish even a presumption in her favor, for on those landed, and on those seized, we find the same inscription, that is, "Mrs. Savage's baggage, apparel, and haberdashery." In this uncertainty and confusion, which is the result of her own irregular conduct, and which it was her business, and not that of the court, to remove, she has exposed her case to very unfavorable inferences. One of the trunks landed was empty, or contained only a few books and loose papers, and yet it appears, by a cocket produced before the Circuit Court, that this very trunk, when taken aboard, was valued in London at 115 pounds sterling. What became of the goods which it then contained, is left without explanation. This forms a part of the res gesta, and is a circumstance, if not a strong suspicion, at any rate but little calculated to evince the integrity of the transaction.

Without, therefore, entering into a more minute detail of the circumstances in this case, the court is well satisfied, from the whole of the evidence, notwithstanding some little obscurity in which it is involved, that the trunks in question formed a part of the baggage entry of the claimant, and therefore, affirm the sentence of the Circuit Court, with cost.

THE NUEVA ANNA AND LIEBRE.

THE SPANISH CONSUL, Claimant.

This court does not recognize the existence of any lawful court of prize at Galveztown, nor of any Mexican republic or state, with power to authorize captures in war.

APPEAL from the District Court of Louisiana.

These were the cases of the cargoes of two Spanish ships, captured and condemned by a pretended court of admiralty at Galveztown, constituted by Commodore Aury, under the alleged authority of the Mexican republic. The goods were, after this condemnation, brought into the port of New Orleans, and there libeled by the original Spanish owners in the District Court. That court decreed restitution to the original owners, and the captors appealed to this court.

This cause was argued by Mr. Hopkinson for the respondents and libelants, no counsel appearing for the appellant and captors.

The court stated, that it did not recognize the existence of any court of admiralty sitting at Galveztown, with authority to adjudicate on captures, nor had the government of the United States hitherto acknowledged the existence of any Mexican republic or state at war with Spain; so that the court could not consider as legal, any acts done under the *flag and *194 commission of such republic or state. But, as the record, in this case, stated the capture to have been made under the flag of Buenos Ayres, it became necessary to send back the case, in order to ascertain under what authority it was in fact made.

[INSTANCE COURT.]

THE COLLECTOR. WILMOT, Claimant.

In all proceedings in rem, on an appeal, the property follows the cause into the Circuit Court, and is subject to the disposition of that court. But it does not follow the cause into the Supreme Court, on an appeal to that court.

After an appeal from the District to the Circuit

Court, the former court can make no order respecting the property, whether it has been sold, and the proceeds paid into court, or whether it remains specifically, or its proceeds remain in the hands of the marshal.

It is a great irregularity for the marshal to keep the property or the proceeds thereof in his own hands, or to distribute the same among the parties entitled, without a special order from the court; but such an irregularity may be cured by the assent and ratification of all the parties interested, if there be no mala fides.

A PPEAL from the Circuit Court of Maryland.

The facts of this case were as follows:

In the year 1807, the schooner Collector and cargo were libeled in the District Court of the district of Maryland, as forfeited under the act 195* of Congress, *prohibiting commercial intercourse with certain ports of St. Domingo.

John Wilmot, the present petitioner and libellant, and the house of Tagart & Caldwell, claimed the whole property.

Pending the proceedings in the District Court, the vessel and cargo were sold under an order to "bring in the proceeds, subject to the future disposition thereof." The money, notwithstanding this order, was never paid to the clerk, nor was it ever deposited by him in any court, and the court never afterwards made any order respecting it.

The property was condemned in the district and circuit courts, which latter decree was reversed by the Supreme Court, in the term of February, 1809, and the property libeled ordered to be restored. The mandate of the Supreme Court was filed below, the 11th of May following. The present libel and petition was filed in the District Court, the 8th of June, 1816, when a decree passed dismissing the same, which was afterwards affirmed by the Circuit Court, from whose sentence this appeal was taken.

The object of the present appeal was to obtain the benefit of the decree of the Supreme Court, that is, restitution of the property, according to the rights of the respective claimants; the appellant insisting on one-half of the proceeds of vessel and cargo, as joint owner, and also upon a lien on the other half as ship's husband, for advances made beyond his proportion of the outfits of the voyage, as well as for expenses in defending the vessel and cargo against the information which had been filed 196* against them, *and for this purpose prayed that the marshal might be ordered to bring in the proceeds, according to the interlocutory decree, and that the same might be restored, pursuant to the decree of the Supreme Court, preserving to the parties their respective rights, liens, &c., concluding with a general prayer for relief.

From the petition of the appellant, the answer of the marshal, and the proofs in the cause, it appeared, that the marshal, although he sold the schooner and her cargo, did not, in fact, bring the money into court. That for the moiety of the proceeds belonging to Tagart & Caldwell, an order was given by them in favor of Van Wyck & Dorsey, as early as March, 1807, in consequence of which order Van Wyck and Dorsey, who sold the property at auction, under the marshal's directions, were permitted to retain the part belonging to Tagart & Caldwell, upon an understanding to keep it, if the vessel and cargo were acquitted, but to return it in case of a different issue. That the other moiety of the proceeds was paid on the 6th of April, 1809, which was previous to the filing of the mandate in the court below, by the marshal, to the present appellant, as appears by his receipt of that date, and which expresses the sum therein mentioned, to be for his one half of the net proceeds of the sale of the schooner Collector and cargo. The marshal died, pending the proceedings, and they were revived against his executors.

Mr. Mitchell, for the appellant and claimant, *197 stated, that this was not a motion [*197 in the court below, for a rule against the marshal, to lay the foundation for an attachment, but a proceeding in the nature of an original libel, to give effect to the sentence of this court, as another court of admiralty, in the former cause. That the District Court has jurisdiction to sustain such a libel or petition, founded upon the sentences of foreign courts, and a fortiori of our own, appears by numerous authorities.<sup>1</sup> The mandate from this court was properly filed in the District Court, because if the proceeds were to be considered as in court at all, they were in that court. They remained in that court, notwithstanding the appeal, and it was, therefore, the proper tribunal to execute the decree of restitution. According to the English practice in proceedings in rem, the thing in controversy does not follow the suit into the Court of Appeals, but remains in that where the proceeding was originally commenced.<sup>2</sup> This is also the law of our own country.<sup>3</sup> The ground of complaint here is, that the proceeds have not been brought into the registry, in pursuance of the interlocutory decree of the District Court, which is the only tribunal competent to vindicate its own decrees. The Circuit Court has no original jurisdiction in **ad- [*198* miralty and maritime cases, and cannot redress a violation of the orders of the District Court. The object of the present application, is not merely to compel the payment of the proceeds into court, but to obtain payment of money out of court, which requires the solemnity of a petition analogous to the proceedings in chancery in a similar case. Lord Eldon would never suffer money to be paid out of court on motion, but put the party to his petition, stating his rights, which would thus appear on the records of the court at any distance of time; and this practice was approved and adopted by Lord Erskine.<sup>4</sup> (2) The claimant insists upon his lien as part owner and ship's husband, on the voyage in which she was seized, for advances made by him, besides his absolute right in one moiety.<sup>5</sup> It is an incontrovertible principle, that where property is taken out of the hands of a party, in invitum, and by legal process, the law will retain all his liens, and return it to him, still subject to them, as before.<sup>6</sup> It is true, that a person holding a dormant title, who stands by and witnesses a sale to another, is guilty of fraud; but if this lien be an equity raised by law, and not by the act of the parties, it requires no notice. The receipt of part out of the registry of a court of admiralty, is no bar or prejudice to the residue of the claim, but the party may afterwards file his libel, and have a monition for the further sum due.<sup>1</sup> 199*] The *marshal has not done his duty under the interlocutory decree, directing him to bring the money into court. We do not insist on an actual delivery to the register, in facie curiæ, but that the specific proceeds should be separated from all other property, so that the decree of the court shall act upon it, without the necessity of the concurring will of the officer. The property is not to be confounded with the private funds of the officer, so that it cannot be distinguished and recovered, if he absconds; or if he dies, will be subject to a distribution of assets in the hands of his personal representative.<sup>2</sup> In this case, the executor is liable, not as for a tort, but to restore funds which are not assets in his hands.

Mr. Pinkney and Mr. Wheaton, contra, (1) insisted, that the cases cited on the other side, of Jennings v. Carson,<sup>3</sup> and Penhallow v. Doane,<sup>4</sup> were proceedings to enforce the decrees of the Continental Court of Appeals, which had ceased to exist; similar in their nature to those cases in England where the prize commissions to certain vice-admiralty courts had expired, and application was made to the High Court of Admiralty to carry into effect their decrees.<sup>5</sup> In the cases cited, the District Court had jurisdiction, because it is a court of prize of the first resort, with all the powers of 200*] the English High *Court of Admiralty inherent in it; and the proceeding could be commenced nowhere else, because it is the only court of original prize jurisdiction. But the present case is a proceeding under the judiciary act, where the Supreme Court does not execute its own decrees, but sends its mandate to the Circuit, and not to the District Court; and the Circuit Court must, therefore, execute the mandate, and distribute the proceeds of the property. The property follows the cause into the Circuit, but not into the Supreme Court. (2) Here the distribution, though irregularly made by the marshal, without the special direction of the court, is precisely what the court would have made upon an application. It is a rule of the Court of Admiralty to restore, or to condemn, the gross tangible property, without regard to any liens which parties other than the general owners may have upon it. So that if the court had now to pronounce the distribution of the property, it would not enter into these minute inquiries respecting the claims of the part owners against each other, but leave them to their remedy at common law or in equity. Thus, in the case of The Jefferson,<sup>6</sup> Sir W. Scott refused to sever the share of a bankrupt partner in favor of his assignees, but restored the property in solidum, leaving the assignees to their remedy in the proper forum. (3) But supposing the court would interfere to protect the pretended lien, there is no proof of its existence; or if it ever existed, it has been waived, and the distribution made *with the assent of all the parties inter- *201 ested. The appellant has received his moiety of the gross property. And even if it were not so, the personal representative of the deceased marshal is not liable in this form. The regular course would be to proceed against the marshal himself, by motion, and a rule directing him to bring the money into court. But this proceeding could not be continued against his executors. The provisions of the judiciary act relative to the revival of suits, do not apply to this proceeding, because it cannot, upon general principles of admiralty law and practice, be continued against the personal representatives of the officer. If it could be revived against them, the relation of their testator with the court, as an officer, would cease, and it would become a common debt, subject to the ordinary course of administration.

Mr. Justice LIVINGSTON delivered the opinion of the court, and after stating the facts, proceeded as follows: This is, to say the least, a very novel and extraordinary proceeding. The marshal, probably without any improper views, or an intention of making use of the proceeds of the vessel and cargo, disobeys the order of the judge, and instead of depositing them in the registry of the court, keeps them under his own control, and finally distributes them among the parties without any direction of the court on the subject. This was a great irregularity, but the owners of the schooner Collector and cargo have no right at this day to complain of it. They were early apprised of the situation of their *property. *202 Two of them gave an order on the marshal for their proportion of the proceeds before any sale had taken place; and the other, who is the present appellant, received of the marshal his share before the sentence of reversal, which was pronounced here, had been made known to the court below. After this ratification, or sanction, on their part, of the irregular conduct of the marshal, neither of them ought now to be permitted to seek any other redress from him. Before any distribution of the proceeds by the marshal, they might have applied to the court to enforce obedience to its order, as it regarded the bringing of them into court, and then have had their respective pretensions adjudicated by the court itself. Not having proceeded in this manner, the District Court, if it have jurisdiction of the case, could not now, without great danger of doing injustice, interfere in this business. Whatever notice it might have taken of the lien, which is now set up by the appellant, on a part of these proceeds beyond his moiety, if the proceeds were still in that court, it is by no means clear, that the marshal ought now to be rendered liable to the appellant for them, there being nothing like satisfactory proof that he had notice of such a claim when the appellant took from him his moiety, nor until long after he had parted with the whole of the property. Under this view of the case, the court is of opinion, that the appellant, under the particular circumstances of this case, is not entitled, on the merits, to any relief against the marshal. But the court is further of opinion, 203*] *that the proceeding on the present petition, and that in the District Court, was coram non judice.

By an appeal from the sentence of a district court to a circuit court, the latter becomes possessed of the cause, and executes its own judgment without any intervention of the former. It is fit, therefore, that the proceeds of the property, if it have been converted into money, should follow the appeal into the Circuit Court, and be deposited in such bank, or other place as it may direct, there to remain, subject to the disposition and direction of the Circuit Court. And if the property at the time of the appeal remain in specie in the marshal's custody, and any order or direction shall become necessary for its sale or preservation after an appeal, such order must emanate from the Circuit Court. But if a further appeal be had to the Supreme Court, the property, or its proceeds, will still continue in the Circuit Court, because the Supreme Court, in such cases, does not execute its own judgments, but sends a special mandate to the Circuit Court to award execution thereon.

The proceeds, therefore, of the Collector and cargo, at the time of filing the present petition and libel, even if the order of the District Court in relation to them had been complied with, could not, after the appeal, be regarded as in, or under, the control of the District Court, which was, therefore, incompetent, when this petition was filed, to make any order respecting them.

ANDERSON v. DUNN.

To an action of trespass against the sergeant at arms of the House of Representatives of the United States, for an assault and battery and false imprisonment, it is a legal justification and bar, to plead, that a Congress was held and sitting, during the period of the trespasses complained of, and that the House of Representatives had resolved that the plaintiff had been guilty of a breach of the privileges of the House, and of a high contempt of the dignity and authority of the same; and had ordered that the speaker should issue his warrant to the sergeant at arms, commanding him to take the plaintiff into custody, wherever to be found, and to have him before the said House, to answer to the said charge; and that the speaker did accordingly issue such a warrant, reciting the said resolution and order, and commanding the sergeant at arms to take the plaintiff into custody, &c., and delivered the said warrant to the defendant. By virtue of which warrant the defendant arrested the plaintiff, and conveyed him to the bar of the House, where he was heard in his defense, touching the matter of the said charge, and the examination being adjourned from day to day, and the House having ordered the plaintiff to be detained in custody, he was accordingly detained by the defendant, until he was finally adjudged to be guilty, and convicted of the charge aforesaid, and ordered to be forthwith brought to the bar, and reprimanded by the speaker, and then discharged from custody; and after being thus reprimanded, was actually discharged from the arrest and custody aforesaid.

ERROR to the Circuit Court of the District of Columbia.

And the said Thomas, by the leave of the court here first had, further defends the force and injury, when, &c. And as to the coming with force and arms, or whatsoever is against the peace; and also as to the assaulting, beating, bruising, battering, and ill-treating of the said John, in manner and form as the said John, in his said declaration, hath above supposed to be done, the said Thomas saith that he is not guilty thereof; and of this he, as before, puts himself upon the country. And as to the imprisonment of the said John, and the keeping and detaining him in confinement, at the time in the said declaration mentioned, to wit, on the said eighth day of January, in the year one thousand eight hundred and eighteen, and for the space of two months in the said declaration mentioned, the said Thomas saith, that the said John ought not to have or maintain his action aforesaid against him, because he saith that long before and at the said time when, &c., in the introduction of this plea mentioned, and during all the time in the said declaration mentioned, a Congress of the United States was holden at the city of Washington, in the county of Washington, and District of Columbia aforesaid, and was then and there, *and [*206 during all the time aforesaid, assembled and sitting; and that long before and at the time when, &c., in the introduction of this plea mentioned, and during all the time in the said declaration mentioned, he the said Thomas was, and yet is, sergeant at arms of the House of Representatives (then and there being one of the Houses whereof the said Congress of the United States consisted), and by virtue of his said office, and by the tenor and effect of the standing rules and orders ordained and established by the said House for the determining of the rules of its proceedings, and by the force and effect of the laws and customs of the said House, and of the said Congress, was then and there, and during all the time aforesaid, and yet is duly authorized and required, amongst other things, to execute the commands of the said House, from time to time, together with all such process issued by authority thereof, as shall be directed to him by the speaker of the said House; and that long before, and at the time when, &c., in the introduction of this plea mentioned, and during all the time in the dec-

And the said Thomas, the defendant, further saith, that the said Henry Clay, so being such speaker of the said House of Representatives as aforesaid, and the said Thomas Dougherty, so being such clerk of the same House as aforesaid, and he 208* the said defendant, *so being such sergeant at arms of the same House as aforesaid, and the said Congress, so being assembled and sitting as aforesaid, heretofore and before the said time when, &c., in the introduction of this plea mentioned, to wit, on the seventh day of January, in the year aforesaid, at Washington aforesaid, in the county and district aforesaid, it was, in and by the said House, for good and sufficient cause to the same appearing, resolved and ordered, pursuant to the tenor and effect of such standing rules and orders so ordained and established as aforesaid, and according to the force and effect of such laws and customs as aforesaid, that the said John had been guilty of a breach of the privileges of the said House, and of a high contempt of the dignity and authority of the same; wherefore, it was then and there, in and by the said House, further resolved and ordered, in the like pursuance of such standing rules and orders as aforesaid, and of such laws and customs as aforesaid, that the said speaker should forthwith issue his warrant, directed to the sergeant at arms, commanding him to take into custody the body of the said John, wherever to be found, and the same forthwith to have before the said House, at the bar thereof, then and there to answer to the said charge, &c., as by the journal, record, and proceedings of the said resolutions and order in the said House remaining, reference being thereto had, will more fully appear. Whereupon, the said Henry Clay, so being such speaker as aforesaid, in pursuance of such standing rules and orders as aforesaid, and according to such laws and customs as aforesaid, did, for *the execution [*209 of the resolutions and order aforesaid, afterwards and before the time when, &c., in the introduction of this plea mentioned, to wit, on the said seventh day of January, in the year aforesaid, at Washington aforesaid, in the county aforesaid, as such speaker as aforesaid, duly make and issue his certain warrant, under his hand and seal, duly directed to the said Thomas, the defendant, as such sergeant at arms as aforesaid (to whom, so being such sergeant at arms as aforesaid, the execution of such warrant then and there belonged), and by the said Thomas Dougherty, so being such clerk as aforesaid; in and by said warrant, reciting that the said House of Representatives had, that day, resolved and adjudged, that the said John Anderson had been guilty of a breach of the privileges of the said House, and of a high contempt of its dignity and authority; and that the said House had thereupon ordered the said speaker to issue his warrant, directed to the said sergeant at arms, commanding him, the said sergeant, to take into custody the body of the said John Anderson, wherever to be found, and the same forthwith to have before the said House, at the bar thereof, then and there to answer to the said charge; therefore, it was required that the said Thomas, the defendant, as such sergeant as aforesaid, should take into his custody the body of the said John Anderson, and then forthwith to bring him before the said House, at the bar thereof, then and there to answer to the charge aforesaid, and to be dealt with by the said House, according to the constitution and laws of the United States; and said *Henry Clay, so being such speaker [*210 as aforesaid, then and there, and before the said time, when, &c., in the introduction of this plea mentioned, delivered the said warrant to the said Thomas, so being such sergeant as aforesaid, to be executed in due form of law. By virtue, and in execution of which said warrant, the said Thomas, as such sergeant as aforesaid, afterwards, to wit, at the said time when &c., in the introduction of this plea mentioned, at Washington aforesaid, in order to arrest the said John, and convey him in custody to the bar of the said House, to answer to the charge aforesaid, and to be dealt with by the said House, according to the constitution and laws of the United States, in obedience to the resolutions and order aforesaid, and to the tenor and effect of the said warrant, so issued as aforesaid, went to the said John, and then and there gently laid his hands on the said John to arrest him, and did then and there arrest him by his body, and take him into custody, and did then forthwith convey him to the bar of the said House, as it was lawful for the said Thomas to do for the cause aforesaid; and thereupon such proceedings were had, in and by the said House, that the said John was then and there forthwith duly examined, and heard in his defense, before the said House, at the bar thereof, touching the matter of the said charge; and that such examination was, in and by the said House, and by the resolutions and orders of the same, duly adjourned and continued from day to day, from the said time when, &c., in the introduction of this plea mentioned, until the sixteenth day of January, in 211* the *year aforesaid; which said examinations were then so adjourned and continued, as aforesaid, from necessity, in order to go through and conclude the examination and defense of the said John, touching the matter of the said charge, before the said House; neither the said examination, nor the said defense, having been finished or concluded before the day last aforesaid; during all which time, to wit, from the said time when, &c., in the introduction of this plea mentioned, until the day last aforesaid, it was, in and by the said House, duly resolved and ordered, from day to day, as the said examination was adjourned and continued as aforesaid, that the said John should be remanded, kept, and detained in the custody of the said Thomas, as such sergeant as aforesaid, by virtue and in execution of the said warrant, in order to have such his examinations and defense finished and concluded, in due form; and the said Thomas, as such sergeant as aforesaid, afterwards, to wit, at and from the said time when, &c., in the introduction of this plea mentioned, until the said sixteenth day of January, in the year aforesaid, did, in pursuance of the last-mentioned resolutions and orders of said House, and by virtue, and in execution of the said warrant, keep and detain the said John in custody as aforesaid, and him did bring and have, from day to day, during the said time, before the said House, at the bar thereof, in order to undergo such examinations as aforesaid, and to be heard in his defense aforesaid, touching the matter of the said charge, to wit, at Washington aforesaid, in the county aforesaid, it was also lawful for him. 212* the *said Thomas, to do for the cause aforesaid; and thereupon afterwards, to wit, on the said last-mentioned sixteenth day of January, in the year aforesaid, such further proceedings were had in and by the said House, that it was then and there finally resolved and adjudged, in and by the said House, that the said John was guilty, and convict of the charge aforesaid in the form aforesaid; and that he be forthwith brought to the bar of the said House, and there reprimanded by the said speaker, for the outrage by the said John committed, and then that he be forthwith discharged from the custody of the said sergeant at arms. And thereupon the said John was then and there, in pursuance of the last-mentioned resolutions, order, and judgment, forthwith reprimanded by the said speaker, and then forthwith discharged from the arrest and custody aforesaid; as by the journals, record, and proceedings of the said resolutions, orders, and judgment in the said House remaining, reference being thereto had, will more fully appear; which are the same several supposed trespasses in the introduction of this plea mentioned, and whereof the said John hath, above, in his said declaration, complained against the said

Thomas, and not other or different. With this, that the said Thomas doth aver that the said John, the now plaintiff, and the said John Anderson, in the said resolutions, orders, warrant, and judgment respectively mentioned, was, and is, one and the same person; and that at the said several times in this plea mentioned, and during all the time therein mentioned, the said Congress of the United States was *assembled [*213 and sitting, to wit, at Washington aforesaid, in the county aforesaid; and this the said Thomas is ready to verify. Wherefore he prays judgment, if the said John ought to have or maintain his aforesaid action thereof against him, &c.

Mr. Hall, for the plaintiff in error, made three points:

1. That the House of Representatives had no authority to issue the warrant.
2. That the warrant is illegal on the face of it.
3. That in either case, it is no justification to the officer who executed it.

1. If the House had authority, it must be either in virtue of the constitution of the United States, of usage and precedent, or as inherent in, and incidental to, legislative bodies. In the constitution there are but two clauses which can be made to serve the purpose. The first article, section eight, enables Congress to make all laws which may be necessary and proper to effectuate the powers expressly given. But it is obvious, that this merely authorizes the legislature collectively, not one House separately, to pass certain laws, not mere occasional sentences. And the powers delegated to the United States, being in derogation of the rights of sovereign states, must be construed strictly.<sup>1</sup> For the same reasons, the authority to determine the rules of its proceedings (art. 1, sec. 5) cannot be construed to operate beyond the walls of the House, except on its own *members; [*214 and its officers. It is observable, also, that this authority is coupled with an authority to punish its members for misbehaviour, and to expel a member. It is a rule of construction, that the text should be considered in connection with the context; but the context, viz., the power to punish and to expel, relates solely to the internal polity and economy of the House. The authority is to determine the rules of its proceedings, not the proceedings themselves, for these are determined by the constitution itself in the first article. The fifth section of the first article, authorizes the House to punish its members; et enumeratio unius est exclusio alterius. The power of issuing warrants is manifestly judicial. This may be assumed as an axiom. The constitution ordains, that the judicial power (which is equivalent to all the judicial power) shall be vested in one supreme court, and other inferior courts (art. 3, sec. 1). Thus, the right of the courts to exercise such a power, is exclusive, and an assumption of it by any other department, is an usurpation. Nor can the authority be inferred from usage and precedent. These must be, either of the two Houses of Congress, the state legislatures, or the British Parliament. On the journals of the House of Representatives, are found the cases of Randal and Whitney, and two others. On those of the Senate, is the case of the editor of the Aurora, &c. Shall we be told that these proceedings were acquiesced in? The want of spirit in the individual to resist oppression, cannot fairly be construed into acquiescence on the part of the 215 public; since that resistance *could be made only by the person immediately affected. As to the usage of the state legislatures, it is either under color of their unlimited powers, of express provisions in their constitution, or of the common law and the usage of Parliament. In this case, unlimited powers and express provision are not pretended; the penal code of the common law is no part of the federal system. Is, then, the authority incident to legislative bodies? An incident is defined, "a thing necessarily depending upon, or appertaining to, another that is more worthy, or principal." So the constitution of the United States (art. 1, sec. 8), when regulating the incidental powers of Congress, authorizes it to make such law only as may be "necessary" to effectuate the express powers. Necessity, then, is the criterion of incident. But is a power to punish the offer of a bribe beyond the verge of the House necessary to enable Congress to perform its duties? The impunity of the offense being the only possible reason of the necessity, if the offender may be adequately punished by the courts of justice in the ordinary mode of proceeding, the supposed necessity ceases. Bribery of a member of Congress is punishable in the state courts, and in the Circuit Court of the District of Columbia, according to the course of the common law. Redress may also be had before the same tribunals, in case of the battery or libel of a member; and if the existing remedies be insufficient, an act of Congress may be made to supply the deficiency. And though the ordinary remedies should not reach every possible case, it is a rule, that "if the 216 words of a statute do not extend to a mischief which rarely occurs, they shall not, by an equitable construction, be extended to that mischief; but it is a casus omissus; and the objects of statutes, are mischiefs, quæ frequentius accidunt." It is evident, that the framers of the constitution deemed it more prudent to leave such mere possible mischiefs unprovided for, than to incur a certain evil by vesting an extraordinary and dangerous prerogative for their suppression.

2. The warrant is illegal on the face of it. By the fourth article of the amendments to the constitution, it is provided, that "no warrant shall issue but on probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation." Thus are prohibited all warrants which do not rest on oath, and on probable cause. But it is no less necessary that the warrant should recite the cause in special and the oath. The constitution is not satisfied with "a cause" so vague and indefinite, as "high contempt and breach of privilege." When it adopts a term from the common law, it adopts, also, the law regulating its incidents and properties, unless repugnant to that instrument. Now, what are the incidents and properties of a warrant at common law? It is said by Dalton, that "the warrant ought to contain the special cause and matter whereupon it is granted."<sup>2</sup>

3. If there be either a defect of authority in the House, or illegality in the warrant, it is no justification. That it is none in the former case, has long *since been settled in this [217 court.<sup>3</sup> As to the latter alternative of the proposition, the constitution, by prohibiting an act, renders it void, if done; otherwise, the prohibition were nugatory.<sup>4</sup> Thus, the warrant is a nullity. The rights of Congress on the subject of contempts, have been considered similar, and equal to those of the federal courts. But here we must recur again to the maxim, that when the constitution adopts a term from the common law, it adopts, also, its incidents. At common law, the power to punish contempt is incident to courts. But "Congress," and the "House of Representatives," being terms unknown to the common law, can derive no claims through it. Courts enforce the laws; they must, therefore, be clothed with authority to compel obedience to them; whereas, the legislature is merely deliberative. But, it is asked, are the members to be insulted with impunity, in a manner which will not authorize the interference of a court? If the insolence be merely by words or gestures, not amounting to slander or assault, the genius of our institutions does not admit of its punishment. Privilege of Congress is reduced by the sixth section, art. 1, of the constitution, to exemption from arrest, and freedom of speech. From the nature of the enumerated privileges, it is evident that the sole object of giving them was to prevent interruption of the business of the Houses, not to render the person and feelings of members more sacred than those of other citizens. An attempt to *bribe a member may be [218 made in Maine or Missouri. The Speaker's warrant may be issued on a mere allegation without oath, commanding the sergeant at arms to arrest the accused "wherever found," and bring him to the bar of the House. So that he may be dragged from the extreme of the Union, to be tried by a legislative body. Yet the constitution (art. 3, sec. 2) provides, that "the trial of all crimes shall be by jury; and that such trial shall be held in the state and district where the offense was committed;" and, also, (art. 5, amendments,) that "no person shall be held to answer for an infamous crime, except on the presentment or indictment of a grand jury; nor shall be deprived of liberty without due process of law." And further, that "in all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial, by an impartial jury of the state and district." It is only necessary to compare the conduct of the House of Representatives, in the case at bar, with these provisions, in order to perceive its gross injustice and illegality.

The Attorney-General and Mr. Jones, contra, stated, that the only question before the court was, whether the House of Representatives could exercise the power in question, either as incidental to its legislative, or its judicial capacity.

1. The House being one branch of the legislature, no legislative act can be performed without its concurrence, and therefore an attack upon it, is an attack upon the whole Congress. The necessity of self-defense is as incidental to legislative, as to 219 judicial *authority. This power is not a substantive provision of the common law adopted by us; it is rather a principle of universal law growing out of the natural right of self-defense belonging to all persons. It is unnecessary to resort to the doctrine of constructive contempts, in order to vindicate the conduct of the defendant as a ministerial officer. He merely executed the judgment of the House, pronouncing the plaintiff guilty of a breach of privilege, and a high contempt. It was confessedly within the competency of the House to render such a judgment in some cases: such as that of a direct interruption of its proceedings by open violence within the walls. But from the plea, non constat, what was the nature of the offense committed by the plaintiff. Nor was it necessary that the plea should set out the facts constituting the contempt. It is sufficient for the protection of the officer, that the House has jurisdiction to punish contempts, and that it had adjudged the plaintiff guilty of a contempt. The power of punishing contempts is incidental to all courts of justice, and even to the most inferior magistrates, when in the exercise of their public functions, and arises out of the absolute necessity of the case, which renders it indispensable that they should have such a power.

2. Each branch of the legislature has certain powers of judicature under the constitution, and the House of Representatives has the exclusive power of impeachment; which necessarily involves the authority of compelling the attendance of witnesses, and punishing them for contempt. Even Lord Holt, who was an 220 enemy of the extravagant privileges *of Parliament, admits that the power of impeachment residing in the House of Commons, necessarily involved the authority of committing the accused, and of punishing contempts.<sup>1</sup> The powers of judging of elections, and of punishing members for disorderly conduct, necessarily involves all the incidents of judicature. Nothing appears upon the face of the record to show that it was not in the exercise of these very powers, or in defense of the admitted privileges of the House, that the warrant issued. It need not appear on the face of the warrant that the cause out of which the contempt grew, was within the judicial powers of the House. The mere question between the ministerial officer and the offender, is, whether the warrant was issued by a court of competent jurisdiction, and whether he has pursued the precept in the manner of executing it. In other words, the only question is, whether the House has, in any case, the power of punishing contempts. If it has jurisdiction, it is a peculiar exclusive jurisdiction, and its exercise cannot be questioned or re-examined elsewhere. The doctrine is settled and established in this court, that the grant of the powers expressly given to Congress in the constitution, involves all the incidental powers necessary and proper to carry them into effect.<sup>2</sup> And the general grant of judicial powers to the courts of the United States, does not exclude the other branches of the government from the exercise of certain portions *of judicial authority. The [221 different departments of the government could not be divided in this exact, artificial manner. They all run into each other. Even the President, though his functions are principally executive, has a portion of legislative power; and the Congress is invested with certain portions of judicial power. The whole of this subject has been thoroughly investigated, in two recent cases in England, and the authorities cited on the argument of those cases, renders it unnecessary to repeat a reference to them on the present occasion.<sup>3</sup>

*It is sufficient to say, that they fully [222

2.—M'Culloch v. Maryland, 4 Wheat. Rep. 316.

3.—Burdett v. Abbott, 14 East's Rep. 1; Burdett v. Colman, 1h. 163.

In these cases, the pleas by the Speaker and Sergeant at Arms of the House of Commons justified the supposed trespasses under a warrant reciting a resolution of the House that "a letter signed 'Sir Francis Burdett,' and a further part of a paper entitled, 'Argument,' in Cobbet's Weekly Register, of March 24, 1814, was a libelous and scandalous paper, reflecting on the just rights and privileges of that House; and that Sir Francis Burdett, who had admitted the letter and argument to have been printed by his authority, has been thereby guilty of a breach of the privileges of that House," and that it was thereupon ordered by the House, that the plaintiff, for his said offense, should be committed to the Tower; and that the Speaker should issue his warrants accordingly. The cases were carried from the Court of King's Bench to the Exchequer Chamber, where the judgments in favor of the defendants were affirmed upon the same grounds stated by the judges of the K. B. in East's Rep. The plaintiff, Sir Francis Burdett, having brought a writ of error to the House of Lords, the cause was argued for him by Mr. Brougham and Mr. Courtnay, in the session of 1816-1817. After the counsel for the plaintiff in error had been heard, Lord Eldon (Ch.) proposed to their Lordships that the counsel for the defendants should not be heard, until the House should have received the opinion of the judges on the following question, viz.: 'Whether, if the Court of Common Pleas, having adjudged an act to be a contempt of court, had committed for the contempt under a warrant, stating such adjudication generally, without the particular circumstances, and the matter were brought before the Court of King's Bench, by return to a writ of habeas corpus, the return setting forth the warrant, stating such adjudication of contempt generally; whether, in that case, the Court of King's Bench would discharge the prisoner, because the particular facts and circumstances out of which the contempt arose, were not set forth in the warrant.'

The question being handed to the judges, and they having consulted among themselves for a few minutes, Lord Chief Baron Richards delivered their unanimous opinion that in such a case the Court of King's Bench would not liberate.

Lord ELDON (Ch.): "That this is a case of very great importance none will dispute; but, at the same time, I do not think it a case of difficulty. If I did, I should be anxious to hear the counsel for the defendants, before proceeding to judgment. But in my view of the case, considering it as clear in law, that the House of Commons have the power of committing for contempt; that this was a commitment for contempt; that the general nature of the contempt, if that was necessary, was sufficiently set forth in the warrant; and being of opinion that the objections, in point of form, have not been sustained, unless any other noble Lord should express a wish to hear the counsel for the defendants, I shall now move that the judgments in the court below be affirmed."

Lord ERSKINE. "When this matter was first agitated, I understood that the House of Commons intended to pursue a very different course. I was therefore alarmed. I expressed myself, because I felt, with warmth. I have changed none of the opinions I then entertained; I then said that the House of Commons ought to be jealous of such privileges as were necessary for its protection. My opinion is, that these privileges are part of the law of establish the doctrine that a legislative body has, from the necessity of the case, a right to 223*] commit persons for contempt, *in breach of their privileges; that they are the exclusive judges whether those privileges have been violated in the particular instance; and 224*] that *their decisions upon the subject cannot be questioned in any other court or place.

3. As to the form of the warrant, it is unnecessary to describe the offense particularly in the warrant, except for the purpose of letting the party see whether it is bailable or not.<sup>1</sup> But this was only a warrant to arrest the plaintiff, and bring him before the House; a preliminary proceeding absolutely necessary to exercise any sort of jurisdiction over the matter.

Mr. Justice JOHNSON delivered the opinion of the court: Notwithstanding the range which has been taken by the plaintiff's counsel, in the discussion of this cause, the merits of it really lie in a very limited compass. The pleadings have narrowed them down to the simple inquiry, whether the House of Representatives can take cognizance of contempts committed 225*] *against themselves, under any circumstances? The duress complained of was sustained under a warrant issued to compel the party's appearance, not for the actual infliction of punishment for an offense committed. Yet it cannot be denied that the power to institute a prosecution must be dependent upon the power to punish. If the House of Representatives possessed no authority to punish for contempt, the initiating process issued in the assertion of that authority must have been illegal; there was a want of jurisdiction to justify it.

It is certainly true, that there is no power given by the constitution to either House to punish for contempts, except when committed by their own members. Nor does the judicial or criminal power given to the United States, in any part, expressly extend to the infliction of punishment for contempt of either House, or any one co-ordinate branch of the government. Shall we, therefore, decide, that no such power exists?

1.—Chitty's Crim. Law, and the authorities there cited.

the land, and upon this record there is nothing more than the ordinary proceeding; the Speaker of the House of Commons, like any other subject, putting himself on the country as to the fact, and pleading a justification in law; for this was not a plea to the jurisdiction, but a plea in bar. This course of proceeding gave rise to the most heartfelt satisfaction; for if the judgment had been adverse to the defendants, the House would no doubt have submitted. It would be a libel on the House of Commons to suppose that it would not. Therefore, by this judgment, it appears that it is the law which protects the just privileges of the House of Commons, as well as the rights of the subject.

The case has been argued with great propriety; but it was contended that it was not alleged in the warrant that the libel was published by the plaintiff. But it is alleged that the paper was printed by his authority. And if I send a manuscript to the printer of a periodical publication, and do not restrain the printing and publishing of it, and he does print and publish it in that publication, then I am the publisher. The word 'reflecting,' standing by itself, would not be sufficiently distinct. But the warrant recites that the letter had been adjudged to be a libelous and scandalous paper, reflecting on

It is true, that such a power, if it exists, must be derived from implication, and the genius and spirit of our institutions are hostile to the exercise of implied powers. Had the faculties of man been competent to the framing of a system of government which would have left nothing to implication, it cannot be doubted that the effort would have been made by the framers of the constitution. But what is the fact? There is not in the whole of that admirable instrument a grant of powers which does not draw after it others, not expressed, but vital to *their exercise; not substantive and in- [*226 dependent, indeed, but auxiliary and subordinate.

The idea is utopian, that government can exist without leaving the exercise of discretion somewhere. Public security against the abuse of such discretion must rest on responsibility, and stated appeals to public approbation. Where all power is derived from the people, and public functionaries, at short intervals, deposit it at the feet of the people, to be resumed again only at their will, individual fears may be alarmed by the monsters of imagination, but individual liberty can be in little danger.

No one is so visionary as to dispute the assertion that the sole end and aim of all our institutions is the safety and happiness of the citizen. But the relation between the action and the end, is not always so direct and palpable as to strike the eye of every observer. The science of government is the most abstruse of all sciences; if, indeed, that can be called a science which has but few fixed principles, and practically consists in little more than the exercise of a sound discretion, applied to the exigencies of the state as they arise. It is the science of experiment.

But if there is one maxim which necessarily rides over all others, in the practical application of government, it is, that the public functionaries must be left at liberty to exercise the powers which the people have intrusted to them. The interests and dignity of those who created them, require the exertion of the powers indispensable to the attainment of the ends of their creation. Nor is a casual conflict with the rights *of particular individuals any reason to [*227 be urged against the exercise of such powers. The wretch beneath the gallows may repine at the fate which awaits him, and yet it is no less the just rights and privileges of the House of Commons; and the meaning there must be, arrainging the just rights and privileges of the House.

I, myself, while I presided in the Court of Chancery, committed for contempt, in a case in which a pamphlet was sent to me, the object of which was, by partial representation, and by flattering the judge, to procure a different species of judgment from that which would be administered in the ordinary course of justice. I might be wrong, but I do not think I was. The House of Commons, whether a court or not, must, like every other tribunal, have the power to protect itself from obstruction and insult, and to maintain its dignity and character. If the dignity of the law is not sustained, its sun is set, never to be lighted up again. So much I thought it necessary to say, feeling strongly for the dignity of the law; and have only to add, that I fully concur in the opinion delivered by the judges."

The counsel were called in, and informed that the House did not think it necessary to hear counsel for the defendants. And then, without further proceeding, the judgments of the court below were affirmed. 5 Dow's Parl. Rep. 165, 199.

certain, that the laws under which he suffers were made for his security. The unreasonable murmurs of individuals against the restraints of society, have a direct tendency to produce that worst of all despotisms, which makes every individual the tyrant over his neighbor's rights.

That "the safety of the people is the supreme law," not only comports with, but is indispensable to, the exercise of those powers in their public functionaries, without which that safety cannot be guarded. On this principle it is, that courts of justice are universally acknowledged to be vested, by their very creation, with power to impose silence, respect, and decorum, in their presence, and submission to their lawful mandates, and, as a corollary to this proposition, to preserve themselves and their officers from the approach and insults of pollution.

It is true, that the courts of justice of the United States are vested, by express statute provision, with power to fine and imprison for contempts; but it does not follow, from this circumstance, that they would not have exercised that power without the aid of the statute, or not, in cases, if such should occur, to which such statute provision may not extend; on the contrary, it is a legislative assertion of this right, as incidental to a grant of judicial power, and can only be considered either as an instance of abundant caution, or a legislative declaration 228], that the power of punishing for contempt shall not extend beyond its known and acknowledged limits of fine and imprisonment.

But it is contended, that if this power in the House of Representatives is to be asserted on the plea of necessity, the ground is too broad, and the result too indefinite; that the executive, and every co-ordinate, and even subordinate, branch of the government, may resort to the same justification, and the whole assume to themselves, in the exercise of this power, the most tyrannical licentiousness.

This is unquestionably an evil to be guarded against, and if the doctrine may be pushed to that extent, it must be a bad doctrine, and is justly denounced.

But what is the alternative? The argument obviously leads to the total annihilation of the power of the House of Representatives to guard itself from contempts, and leaves it exposed to every indignity and interruption that rudeness, caprice, or even conspiracy, may meditate against it. This result is fraught with too much absurdity not to bring into doubt the soundness of any argument from which it is derived. That a deliberate assembly, clothed with the majesty of the people, and charged with the care of all that is dear to them; composed of the most distinguished citizens, selected and drawn together from every quarter of a great nation; whose deliberations are required by public opinion to be conducted under the eye of the public, and whose decisions must be clothed with all that sanctity 229], which unlimited confidence in their wisdom and purity can inspire; that such an assembly should not possess the power to suppress rudeness, or repel insult, is a supposition too wild to be suggested. And, accordingly, to avoid the pressure of these considerations, it has been argued, that the right of the respective Houses to exclude from their presence, and their absolute control within their own walls, carry with them the right to punish contempts committed in their presence; while the absolute legislative power given to Congress within this district, enables them to provide by law against all other insults against which there is any necessity for providing.

It is to be observed, that so far as the issue of this cause is implicated, this argument yields all right of the plaintiff in error to a decision in his favor; for, non constat, from the pleadings, but that this warrant issued for an offense committed in the immediate presence of the House.

Nor is it immaterial to notice what difficulties the negation of this right in the House of Representatives draws after it, when it is considered, that the concession of the power, if exercised within their walls, relinquishes the great grounds of the argument, to wit, the want of an express grant, and the unrestricted and undefined nature of the power here set up. For why should the House be at liberty to exercise an ungranted, an unlimited, and undefined power within their walls, any more than without them? If the analogy with individual right and power be resorted to, it will reach no farther than to exclusion, and it requires no exuberance of imagination to exhibit 230 the ridiculous consequences which might result from such a restriction, imposed upon the conduct of a deliberative assembly.

Nor would their situation be materially relieved by resorting to their legislative power within the district. That power may, indeed, be applied to many purposes, and was intended by the constitution to extend to many purposes indispensable to the security and dignity of the general government; but they are purposes of a more grave and general character than the offenses which may be denominated contempts, and which, from their very nature, admit of no precise definition. Judicial gravity will not admit of the illustrations which this remark would admit of. Its correctness is easily tested by pursuing, in imagination, a legislative attempt at defining the cases to which the epithet contempt might be reasonably applied.

But although the offense be held undefinable, it is justly contended, that the punishment need not be indefinite. Nor is it so.

* We are not now considering the extent to which the punishing power of Congress, by a legislative act, may be carried. On that subject, the bounds of their power are to be found in the provisions of the constitution.

The present question is, what is the extent of the punishing power which the deliberative assemblies of the Union may assume and exercise on the principle of self-preservation?

Analogy, and the nature of the case, furnish the answer—"the least possible power 231 adequate to the end proposed;" which is the power of imprisonment. It may, at first view, and from the history of the practice of our legislative bodies, be thought to extend to other inflictions. But every other will be found to be mere commutation for confinement; since commitment alone is the alternative where the individual proves contumacious. And even to the duration of imprisonment a period is imposed by the nature of things, since the existence of the power that imprisons is indispensable to its continuance; and although the legislative power continues perpetual, the legislative body ceases to exist on the moment of its adjournment or periodical dissolution. It follows, that imprisonment must terminate with that adjournment.

This view of the subject necessarily sets bounds to the exercise of a caprice which has sometimes disgraced deliberative assemblies, when under the influence of strong passions or wicked leaders, but the instances of which have long since remained on record only as historical facts, not as precedents for imitation. In the present fixed and settled state of English institutions, there is no more danger of their being revived, probably, than in our own.

But the American legislative bodies have never possessed, or pretended to the omnipotence which constitutes the leading feature in the legislative assembly of Great Britain, and which may have led occasionally to the exercise of caprice, under the specious appearance of merited resentment.

232*] *If it be inquired, what security is there, that with an officer avowing himself devoted to their will, the House of Representatives will confine its punishing power to the limits of imprisonment, and not push it to the infliction of corporal punishment, or even death, and exercise it in cases affecting the liberty of speech and of the press? the reply is to be found in the consideration, that the constitution was formed in and for an advanced state of society, and rests at every point on received opinions and fixed ideas. It is not a new creation, but a combination of existing materials, whose properties and attributes were familiarly understood, and had been determined by reiterated experiments. It is not, therefore, reasoning upon things as they are, to suppose that any deliberative assembly, constituted under it, would ever assert any other rights and powers than those which had been established by long practice, and conceded by public opinion. Melancholy, also, would be that state of distrust which rests not a hope upon a moral influence. The most absolute tyranny could not subsist where men could not be trusted with power because they might abuse it, much less a government which has no other basis than the sound morals, moderation, and good sense of those who compose it. Unreasonable jealousies not only blight the pleasures, but dissolve the very texture of society.

But it is argued, that the inference, if any, arising under the constitution, is against the exercise of the powers here asserted by the House of Representatives; that the express 233*] grant of power to punish their *members respectively, and to expel them, by the application of a familiar maxim, raises an implication against the power to punish any other than their own members.

This argument proves too much; for its direct application would lead to the annihilation of almost every power of Congress. To enforce its laws upon any subject without the sanction of punishment is obviously impossible. Yet there is an express grant of power to punish in one class of cases, and one only; and all the punishing power exercised by Congress in any cases, except those which relate to piracy and offenses against the laws of nations, is derived from implication. Nor did the idea ever occur to anyone, that the express grant in one class of cases repelled the assumption of the punishing power in any other.

The truth is, that the exercise of the powers given over their own members, was of such a delicate nature, that a constitutional provision became necessary to assert or communicate it. Constituted, as that body is, of the delegates of confederated states, some such provision was necessary to guard against their mutual jealousy, since every proceeding against a representative would indirectly affect the honor or interests of the state which sent him.

In reply to the suggestion that, on this same foundation of necessity, might be raised a superstructure of implied powers in the executive, and every other department, and even ministerial officer of the government, it would be sufficient to observe, that neither analogy nor precedent would support the assertion *of such powers in any other than a [*234] legislative or judicial body. Even corruption anywhere else would not contaminate the source of political life. In the retirement of the cabinet, it is not expected that the executive can be approached by indignity or insult; nor can it ever be necessary to the executive, or any other department, to hold a public deliberative assembly. These are not arguments; they are visions which mar the enjoyment of actual blessings, with the attack or feint of the harpies of imagination.

As to the minor points made in this case, it is only necessary to observe, that there is nothing on the face of this record from which it can appear on what evidence this warrant was issued. And we are not to presume that the House of Representatives would have issued it without duly establishing the fact charged on the individual. And, as to the distance to which the process might reach, it is very clear that there exists no reason for confining its operation to the limits of the District of Columbia; after passing those limits, we know no bounds that can be prescribed to its range but those of the United States. And why should it be restricted to other boundaries? Such are the limits of the legislating powers of that body; and the inhabitant of Louisiana or Maine may as probably charge them with bribery and corruption, or attempt, by letter, to induce the commission of either, as the inhabitant of any other section of the Union. If the inconvenience be urged, the reply is obvious; there is no difficulty in observing *that respectful deportment which will [*235] render all apprehension chimerical.

LA CONCEPTION.

THE SPANISH CONSUL, Claimant.

Where a capture is made of the property of the subjects of a nation in amity with the United States, by a vessel built, armed, equipped, and owned in the United States, such capture is illegal, and the property, if brought within our territorial limits, will be restored to the original owners.

Where a transfer of the capturing vessel in the ports of the belligerent state, under whose flag and commission she sails on a cruise, is set up in order to legalize the capture, the bona fides of the sale must be proved by the usual documentary evidence, in a satisfactory manner.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of South Carolina.

This was an allegation filed in the District Court of South Carolina by the Vice-Consul of His Catholic Majesty, claiming restitution of the ship La Conception and cargo, as the property of Spanish subjects to him unknown, which had been illegally captured by the armed ship La Union, sailing under the flag of Buenos Ayres, and pretending to have a commission or letter of marque from that government, but actually built, equipped, armed, and manned in the United States. A claim was interposed 236*] by one Brown, claiming the property as having been taken by him, as commander of La Union, on the high seas, under a commission from the government of Buenos Ayres, authorizing him to capture the property of the subjects of Spain. The District and Circuit Courts decreed restitution of the property to the captors, no sufficient evidence being produced of the capturing vessel having been equipped, or having augmented her force in the ports of the United States. On appeal to this court, farther proof was taken, showing conclusively, that the capturing vessel was originally built, owned, and equipped in this country, and after proceeding to Buenos Ayres, and sailing from that port on a cruise, had touched at the port of New Orleans, and there illegally augmented her force, since which, the capture in question was made. This evidence was attempted to be repelled on the part of the captors, by testimony tending to show a transfer of the capturing vessel at Buenos Ayres to domiciled subjects of that country, and that the subsequent augmentation of her force at New Orleans, if any, was very trifling, and only amounted to a replacement of her former equipment.

The Attorney-General and Mr. Hopkinson, for the appellant and claimant, the Spanish consul, argued, that the original owners were entitled to restitution, according to the uniform series of decisions in this court, upon the ground that the capturing ship was built and equipped in the United States, with the intention of cruising against the subjects of Spain, in violation of our neutrality, and actually belonged to citizens 237*] of the United States, when the present capture was made; or had illegally augmented her force in our ports, previous to the capture.<sup>1</sup> That the pretended transfer at Buenos Ayres was evidently colorable, and was not proved by the production of the bill of sale, or any of the other documentary evidence usually expected by maritime courts, to establish a change of this species of property. That the enlistment of additional seamen to the crew at New Orleans, being proved, the onus was, thrown back upon the captors, to show that the persons so enlisted were subjects of Buenos Ayres, transiently within the United States.<sup>2</sup>

Mr. Winder, contra, insisted, that it must be a clear case of the violation of our neutral rights, or the court would not interfere to restore a capture made under a commission from a sovereign state, and that the onus probandi for this purpose was on the Spanish claimant.<sup>3</sup> We have an unquestionable right to build ships for sale, and to export any kind of contraband subject to the risk of capture. And even if a ship be expressly built for war, it may be sold to a belligerent, and afterwards equipped in his own ports to cruise against his enemy.<sup>4</sup> Here the purchaser *was actually domiciled [238 at Buenos Ayres, and there is nothing to impeach the bona fides of the transaction. He then sailed again from Buenos Ayres on a cruise, and the alleged augmentation of the crew at New Orleans was, in effect, nothing but a replacement of the original force, the vessel having lost by desertion nearly the same number of men which she acquired by enlistment. Such a replacement, this court has already determined not to afford a ground for restitution.<sup>5</sup> It is true, that the case cited was under the French treaty of 1778. But the 19th article of that treaty provides nothing more than a right of asylum and hospitality, the same as is enjoyed by the South American cruisers in our ports, under the President's instructions.

The counsel on both sides also argued on the same grounds which are stated in a case of the Bello Corrunes, ante, p. 155, and which it is not thought necessary to repeat.

Mr. Justice Story delivered the opinion of the court:

In this case, if the cause had stood solely upon the evidence before the Circuit Court, we should have no difficulty in affirming its decision. But upon the new proofs which have been since taken, and are now produced to this court, it is apparent that the capturing vessel was originally built, equipped, manned, and armed in the United States for a cruise, being owned by citizens of this country, and *sailed with the intent of cruising [239 against Spain. It is true that she went to Buenos Ayres, and sailed under the colors of that government on a second cruise, during which this capture was made; but, there is no satisfactory evidence that the American ownership ever ceased, or that there was a real, bona fide sale at Buenos Ayres. If such a sale had really taken place, it was perfectly in the power of the captors to have proved it, in the clearest manner. A bill of sale is the customary and universal document by which the ownership of vessels is evidenced; and the want of any document of this nature, or of any direct and positive evidence of an actual sale, leaves no doubt in the mind of the court, that no such sale ever was made. The consequence is, that the capturing vessel must still be considered as owned in the United States; and, according to the decisions which have already been made, the capture was illegal, and the property must be restored to the original Spanish owners.

WILLINKS v. HOLLINGSWORTH ET AL.

H. and others, merchants in Baltimore, consigned a vessel and cargo to W. and others, merchants in Amsterdam, with instructions to them respecting her ulterior destination, which showed, that on the failure of getting a freight to Batavia, or of selling the vessel at a price limited, she was to proceed to St. Petersburg, and there take in a return cargo of Russian goods for the United States, but with instructions to the master committing to him the management of the ulterior voyage. No freight to Batavia could be obtained, and the vessel could not be sold for the price limited at Amsterdam; and W. and others, purchased in Amsterdam, with the concurrence of the master, a return cargo of Russian goods, partly with the money of H. and others, and partly with money advanced by themselves. On the return of the vessel to Baltimore, H. and others, objected to the purchase of this cargo in Amsterdam, as being contrary to express orders, and gave notice to W. and others, of their determination to hold them responsible for all losses sustained in consequence of this breach of instructions; but received the goods and sold them. W. and others brought an assumpsit against H. and others, to recover from them the moneys advanced. The declaration contained the three usual money counts. Held, 1st. That the plaintiffs had a demand in law against the defendants, which could be maintained in this form of action. 2d. That whether the plaintiffs could, or could not, be made responsible in any form of action which might be devised for the possible loss resulting from the breaking up of the intended voyage to St. Petersburg, the defendants were not entitled to a deduction from the plaintiffs' demand, for the amount of such loss.

THIS was an action of assumpsit brought in the Circuit Court of Maryland, by the plaintiffs, who were merchants of Amsterdam, to recover from the defendants, merchants of Baltimore, a sum of money advanced by the 241* plaintiffs in Amsterdam, for the *cargo of the Henry Clay, a vessel belonging to the defendants, which had been consigned by them to the plaintiffs, with an outward cargo, and with orders respecting her ulterior destination, which showed, that on the failure of getting a freight to Batavia, or of selling her at Amsterdam, she was to go to St. Petersburg, and there take in a return cargo of Russian goods for the United States. The plaintiffs purchased in Amsterdam, with the concurrence of the master, a return cargo for the Henry Clay, partly with the money of the defendants, and partly with money advanced by themselves. On her arrival at Baltimore, the defendants objected to the purchase of this cargo in Amsterdam, as being contrary to express orders, and immediately gave notice to the plaintiffs of their disapprobation of the transaction, and of their determination to hold them responsible for all losses sustained in consequence of this departure from instructions. They, however, received the cargo, and sold it.

The declaration contained three counts: The first, for money lent and advanced to the defendants; the second, for money laid out and expended for their use; and the third, for money received by them for the use of the plaintiffs.

On the trial of the cause in the Circuit Court, the defendants prayed the court to instruct the jury, that upon the whole evidence, which is spread on the record, "the plaintiffs have not any demand in law against the defendants which can be maintained in this action; but 242* that, if they have, the defendants *are entitled to a deduction from the same, of the amount of the loss which the jury shall find the said defendants sustained, by reason of the alteration aforesaid, in the destination to St. Petersburg, of the said ship, and the loading her as aforesaid at Amsterdam." On this motion the judges were divided in opinion, and the division certified to this court.

The evidence principally consisted of two letters, dated the 29th of April, 1815, written by M'Kim, one of the defendants, addressed, the one to the plaintiffs, the other to the master of the Henry Clay.

That to the plaintiffs was as follows:

"Gentlemen—The owners of the ship Henry Clay having appointed me the ship's husband for this voyage, and from the introduction of our mutual friends, Robert Gilmore & Sons, I have been directed by the owners to consign the ship to your house, also that part of her cargo which I consider belongs to her owners jointly, agreeable to the invoice, amounting to $1,363.40.

"You will find, that the owners of the ship have shipped tobacco on their separate accounts; the proceeds are to be placed to the credit of John M'Kim, Jun., to remain a fund for the purpose of loading the ship if she should proceed to St. Petersburg. The freight and primage, and also Captain Charles Gantt's bills, which are now inclosed, drawn on you for the sum of 6,550 guilders, are to constitute part of the funds for the loading of the ship.

"Our wish is, in the first place, if a good freight or charter can be had for the ship to Batavia, that *she should proceed there [*243 in preference to any other place.

"And, second, if the ship can be sold for £8,000 sterling, you will dispose of her rather than send her to St. Petersburg."

The letter then proceeds to give such a description of the ship as might enhance her value in the estimation of a purchaser, and then adds, "if the Henry Clay proceeds to St. Petersburg, we must depend on your placing funds there to purchase a cargo of iron, hemp and other goods. If the funds we have placed in your hands should fall short of loading her, Messrs. Gilmore & Sons have written you to make us any advances that may be deficient. Agreeable to the estimate, what we have ordered from St. Petersburg, will not exceed $45,000, and you may rest assured, that any sum advanced us will be remitted to you as soon as we know the amount."

"Dear Sir—The ship Henry Clay is given you in charge, that you proceed with all possible despatch for Amsterdam, and it is recommended that you sail north-about at this fine season of the year. The owners of the ship have the greatest confidence in your good management; that you will take care that your disbursements in every foreign port may be as moderate as possible; that you will purchase every article yourself on the lowest terms that may be required for the ship; that you will use the greatest economy in all your expenditures. After your arrival at Amsterdam, your first object is a *good charter for Batavia, and [*244 if what you know to be a good charter is obtained, you will, of course, accept it in preference to anything else.

"And if a good freight cannot be had to Batavia, and the ship can be sold for £8,000 sterling, you have orders to sell her, and we confidently expect that she will bring more, as she costs upwards of £14,000 sterling, and never made one voyage. I hope that every exertion will be made to proceed to St. Petersburg immediately, if you do not go to Batavia, and the ship cannot be sold; as the season is far advanced, no time must be lost. The same industry must be used to get away from St. Petersburg, for fear that you might be detained there all the winter. The owners must also depend on your attention at St. Petersburg, that the hemp is good that you receive." The letter then gives instructions respecting pilots, protests, &c., and then adds, "Messrs. Willinks will of course endeavor to consign the ship to a friend of theirs at St. Petersburg, but we have great confidence in a house recommended by Mr. Cumberland D. Williams—Messrs. Meyer & Buxner—and we could wish you to consign the ship to them. If any freight should offer from St. Petersburg to Baltimore, of course you will accept of it, and if any goods for Philadelphia or New York should be there, you can inform the shippers how easy they may be sent," &c.

It was also proved, that no freight to Batavia could be obtained, and that the vessel could not be sold at the price limited.

245*] Mr. Harper and Mr. Winder, for the plaintiffs, argued, (1) That the present action could be maintained by the plaintiffs for the moneys advanced by them at Amsterdam, for the purchase of the return cargo received by the defendants at Baltimore. Even supposing that the defendants might have refused to receive it, yet having actually sold it, and received the proceeds of the sale, this raises an assumpsit to pay the money thus received. In the case of Manella v. Barry,<sup>1</sup> foreign merchants, sent by their general agent, written orders to their factor in this country, to purchase goods here upon their account, but to ship the goods in the name of the factor, and by those orders the factor was referred to the verbal communications of the general agent, who undertook to order the goods to be shipped in the name of another person, and declared that he had authority from the foreign merchants thus to control and vary their orders; the factor was held to be justified in obeying the new orders of the general agent, though contrary to the first written orders. So, here the consignment of the ship to the plaintiffs was limited to her transactions at Amsterdam, and the control of her ulterior movements was left to the master. The learned counsel here entered into a minute examination of the correspondence, to show that this was its import.

2. The defendants cannot claim a deduction from the plaintiffs' demand of the amount of the supposed loss sustained by the alteration of 246*] the intended destination *of the vessel to St. Petersburg, and the loading her at Amsterdam. This question depends not on the English statute of set-off, but on the act of Assembly of Maryland, of November, 1785, c. 46, s. 7. This act provides, "That in case any suit shall hereafter be brought on any judgment, or on any bond, or other writing sealed by the party, and the defendants shall have any demand or claim against the plaintiff, upon judgment, bond, or other instrument under seal, or upon note, agreement, assumpsit, or account proved, as by this act is allowed the defendant, or otherwise according to law, shall be at liberty to file his account in bar, or plead discount to the plaintiff's claim, and judgment shall be given for the plaintiff for the sum only which remains due after just discount made; provided the sum which shall remain due after such discount be sufficient to support a judgment in the court where the cause may be tried, according to its established jurisdiction; and in all cases of suits upon simple contracts, the defendant may file an account in bar, or plead discount of any claim he may have against the plaintiff, proved as aforesaid, or otherwise proved according to law, which may be of an equal and superior nature to the plaintiff's claim, and judgment shall be given as aforesaid." Unliquidated damages cannot be admitted by way of discount, according to the very letter of the law, and the uniform decisions of the local courts of Maryland. But even the English statute has received the same construction.<sup>2</sup> Damages for a *breach of the implied contract of an [247 agent are, and necessarily must be, unliquidated. If, then, such damages cannot be set off under the statute, neither can they be admitted incidentally, by way of deduction, upon the equitable principles of an action for money had and received. It would be an evasion of the law to permit such an equitable deduction, which sounds rather in tort than contract. The policy of the law is to prevent two distinct issues, involving controverted questions, from being tried at the same time, thus confounding the simplicity of actions and of proceedings in a court of law.

Mr. Pinkney and Mr. D. B. Ogden, contra, (1) insisted, that the action could not be maintained by the plaintiffs, there having been a manifest breach of instructions on their part, not justified by the pretended approbation of the master. (2) The defendants have a right to a deduction for the loss sustained by them in breaking up the intended voyage to St. Petersburg. No part of the money, for which the action is brought, can be said to be received to the use of the plaintiffs, which, by the very nature of their claim, ought in conscience to be applied to the indemnity of the defendants against the breach of contract which originated the plaintiffs' demand. The claim of the plaintiffs arises from a breach of their duty to the defendants. This breach of duty forced the money in question into the hands of the *defendants. If the plaintiffs should [248 obtain a judgment for the whole of this money, it cannot be doubted that chancery would enjoin execution until the extent of the injury inflicted upon the defendants by the acts which produced the judgment could be ascertained by a jury. And surely in this action for money had and received, a court of law will proceed with the same view, if the existence of the defendants' right to complain is as-certainable (although the exact quantum of the injury is not) by the same evidence, and through the same circumstances, which properly belong to the case of the plaintiffs. The acknowledged nature of the action for money had and received, will otherwise cease, and it will differ in nothing from any other form of action. If we are not to inquire in this action, how, and under what circumstances money was received, in order that we may determine whether, ex æquo et bono, the defendants may retain the whole, or any part of it; and if nothing can prevent a recovery of the whole, but a plea of discount, or a notice of set-off, or such other defense as in ordinary action may be competent, the character given in the books of the action for money had and received, is a perfect delusion. The case of Dale v. Sollet<sup>1</sup> goes the whole length of this doctrine. The deduction there claimed might, perhaps, have been used as a discount or set-off under the statute; although as the claim was not a liquidated one, it probably could not; but at any rate it was not so used, and consequently, as a 249* discount or set-off, *no advantage could be taken of it at the trial. Why, then, was it allowed in that case? Because of the equitable nature of the plaintiff's action, and of the intimate connection between the claim and the defense, out of which arose the conclusion that the defendant might retain, or stop so much of the money, although it was in fact the plaintiff's money which he received, and although there was no precise contract that it should be stopped out of the money received. The right in that case to stop a reasonable compensation (which the parties had not defined) out of the whole sum which had come to the defendant's possession, was exactly such a right as we now insist upon. It stood, as ours does, upon the qualities of that sort of suit which the plaintiff had instituted, and upon the union of the claim and the defense. The defense, indeed, was less complicated in that case than it is in the present one; but so, too, was the plaintiff's demand. And, besides, a defense is not the less a good defense, or an examinable defense, because it does not depend upon a single fact, or does depend on many facts. A jury can deal with it, nevertheless, and does deal with such defenses every day; and there would be a defect of justice if they did not. The defense in this case rests, incontestably, upon contract, as it did in that. The deduction claimed was in that, as in this, unliquidated in amount. The right to the deduction arose in that, out of the whole circumstances of the case. It does so equally in this. The amount was, in that case, as well as in this, part of the case itself, as respected the demand of the plaintiff. Evidence was necessary 250* on the *part of the defendant, to ascertain there the quantum of the deduction, as much as it is here. What case could the plaintiffs in this cause have shown upon any of the counts in their declaration without exposing, or letting in an exposition, of the whole matter on which the defendants rely? Of necessity, the entire transaction was before the jury, and it is upon that, as in Dale v. Sollet, that we contend for the admissibility of a defense which the entire transaction brings under the notice of the court and jury. And it should seem to be monstrous, that when the whole is regularly and necessarily presented, and the result is that the defendants ought, in conscience and equity, to be permitted to retain an ascertainable part of the money received by them for their own use, they should be turned round to a cross action against persons who appear in their writ to be foreigners, and are not therefore amenable to our judicatures, or that (being probably remediless at law, if they are compelled to part with the whole of the money in their hands) they should be driven into chancery for an injunction upon grounds of equity, equally available, as we are taught by the authorities, in an action for money had and received. The cross action, to which the other side refer us, must, in truth, try the present action over again; and a verdict for the present defendants, in such an action, could scarcely be reconciled with a verdict in this cause for the whole amount of the plaintiffs' claim. A cross action, which is to unravel the action now sub judice, and which upon the same circumstances is to establish that the present plaintiffs *ought not [*251 to have what it is now contended they ought to have, seems to be supererogation at least. When a cross action is unavoidable, the necessity must be submitted to; and it is unavoidable where the matters of inquiry are not combined in their nature. But, where so combined, an action for money had and received, opens the entire investigations, and can do ample justice without other assistance. Indeed, it cannot do justice at all on such occasions without exhausting the whole investigation. And to affect to administer equity by shutting out one-half of the real case (upon which the equity of the other half depends), would be a mere mockery. Cross actions are always avoided when it is possible; and here it is not only possible, but absolutely required by the facts.

1.—3 Cranch, 415.

2.—Montagu on Set-Off, 21, and the authorities there cited.

Mr. Chief Justice MARSHALL delivered the opinion of the court, and after stating the facts, proceeded as follows:

On the first branch of the question certified from the Circuit Court, no doubt can be entertained. The defendants having received the cargo of the Henry Clay, and sold it, are accountable for the proceeds, although the cargo should be considered as the property of the plaintiffs. Whether the defendants are liable for the moneys actually advanced in Amsterdam, or for the net amount of sales in Baltimore, considering the goods as the property of the plaintiffs, still they are liable for something; and, of consequence, the action is sustainable.

*In deciding on the second branch [*252 of the instructions which were required, it becomes material to examine the orders which were carried out by the Henry Clay on her voyage from Baltimore to Amsterdam, contained in the letters of the 25th of April, the one to the plaintiffs, the other to the master.

It is admitted, that no freight to Batavia could be obtained, and that the vessel could not be sold at the limited price; consequently, the only deviation from orders alleged by the defendants is, the purchase of the Russian goods for the return cargo at Amsterdam, instead of sending the Henry Clay to St. Petersburg.

That the orders of the defendants to send their ship to St. Petersburg, in the event which had occurred, were positive; and that no authority was given to purchase her return cargo at Amsterdam, under any circumstances, are too apparent for controversy. That this purchase, thus made without authority, whether with, or without, the consent and concurrence of the master, must have been made at the risk of the plaintiffs, is also too clear for argument. But the liability of the plaintiffs for any loss which the defendants may have sustained by the breaking up of the voyage to St. Petersburg, depends on the question whether the control of that voyage was committed to them, or to the master. In considering this question, it is proper to take into view all the instructions which were given, and to compare the two letters written by the defendants with each other.

In the commencement of the letter written by 253* Mr. M'Kim, on the part of the defendants, he says: "I have been directed by the owners to consign the ship to your house, also that part of the cargo which I consider belongs to the owners jointly."

Whether this consignment was limited to the transactions in Amsterdam, or extended to any subsequent voyage in which the Henry Clay might be directed to engage, depends on other parts of the letter.

Mr. M'Kim then proceeds to direct, that certain parts of the outward cargo should "remain as a fund for the purpose of loading the ship, if she should proceed to St. Petersburg."

These orders are precise and explicit, with respect to the funds which are to remain in the hands of the plaintiffs for the purchase of the cargo in St. Petersburg, but are silent respecting any agency of the plaintiffs in making that purchase.

After communicating the desire of the defendants, that a freight should be obtained for Batavia, the letter proceeds to say: "And second, if the ship can be sold for £8,000 sterling, you will dispose of her rather than send her to St. Petersburg."

This part of the letter may indicate, that in some other part of it, might be found an express order to send the Henry Clay to St. Petersburg, if the primary objects of the defendants should be unattainable, but does not in itself amount to such express order. The writer does not say, "we request you, if the vessel cannot be sold, to send her to St. Petersburg;" but, "you will dispose of her, rather than send her to St. Petersburg;" as if there were some 254* authority not communicated by these words to which they have allusion. There is no such authority, unless it be implied in the general consignment of the vessel.

That consignment is completely satisfied by the agency which was to be exercised in Amsterdam. If it was designed to extend it to the eventual voyage to St. Petersburg, the Messrs. Willinks would naturally expect to find some instructions respecting that voyage; respecting the articles of which the cargo was to consist, and their conduct in the purchase of them. But they could find no such instructions. In a subsequent part of the letter, Mr. M'Kim states the estimated value of the cargo he had ordered, and is explicit in his request, that they would advance the necessary funds for laying it in, should those placed in their hands be insufficient; but he is entirely silent with respect to their having any other agency in the voyage.

It was impossible for these gentlemen to read this letter without, at least, doubting their power to interfere further with respect to the voyage to St. Petersburg, than to advance the money which might be required for the cargo to be purchased at that place. The letter contains all the information, and all the power which was necessary for this purpose, but contains neither information nor power, for any other purpose.

It was natural for the Messrs. Willinks to require farther information on this subject, and to seek it from the master. He could have no motive for withholding his letter of instructions from them, and in that they would find, that the management of the *voyage [*255 was committed to him, and that the utmost confidence was reposed in his intelligence and integrity. "I hope," says M'Kim, "that every exertion will be made to proceed to St. Petersburg immediately, if you do not go to Batavia, and the ship cannot be sold." These exertions were to be made by the master; he was to proceed immediately to St. Petersburg; and as no reference is here made to the Messrs. Willinks, the fair inference seems to be, that he was expected to proceed, not in consequence of any orders he should receive from them, but in consequence of the orders he had received from the owners. "The same industry," he is told, "must be used to get away from St. Petersburg." The letter then adds, "the owners must also depend on your attention at St. Petersburg, that the hemp is good that you receive."

But the part of the letter which seems to be conclusive on this point, is that which relates to the consignment of the ship. "The Messrs. Willinks," says the writer, "will of course endeavor to consign the ship to a friend of theirs at St. Petersburg, but we have great confidence in a house recommended by Mr. Cumberland D. Williams—Messrs. Meyer & Buxner—and we wish you to consign the ship to them."

The owners, then, did not suppose that they had empowered the plaintiffs to order the ship to St. Petersburg. They did not suppose that their original consignment of the Henry Clay to the Messrs. Willinks, implied a control over her after the transactions at Amsterdam should be terminated. Had *such a control [*256 existed, those gentlemen would not have consigned her to one of their friends. But these words show conclusively, that the defendants themselves directed the consignment of the ship from Amsterdam to St. Petersburg, and in executing their orders, the master is not merely directed to proceed without consulting the Messrs. Willinks; he is directed to disregard their advice should it be offered.

The plaintiffs could not compare this letter with that addressed to themselves, without perceiving that, with respect to the voyage to St. Petersburg, every order was given directly to the master without reference to them, further than to show that their interference, with respect to the consignment of the ship, was to be disregarded; and that their agency was confined to advancing the necessary funds for the purchase of the return cargo.

Both the master and the Messrs. Willinks appear to have acted on this construction of their respective powers. The correspondence between them contains no indication of an opinion in either, that the voyage to St. Petersburg depended on the orders of those gentlemen. The master does not require their orders, but asks their advice; they do not attempt to order, they only advise. This advice may have been dictated by their best judgment, or may have been dictated by a view to personal interest; still it is mere advice, and was both given and received as advice.

The conduct of the parties, then, is full proof of the opinion each entertained of the authority of each; and the first letters written after they 257*] had met in *Amsterdam, show that free communications had taken place between them. In a letter of the 19th of June, addressed to Captain Gantt, the Messrs. Willinks say: "We have not received yet the promised note of the Russian goods that would be wanted for the Henry Clay." And in the captain's letter from the Helder, of the 18th of June, he says: "Herewith, I annex you a copy of the order for Russian produce, which the owners of the Henry Clay wish to constitute her return cargo."

These letters strengthen the probability, that in the verbal communications which were made at Amsterdam, the captain had stated his orders relative to the voyage to St. Petersburg; at any rate, they show that the note for the cargo which had not been transmitted to the Messrs. Willinks, had been entrusted to him. There is an expression in the last letter of the plaintiffs to the defendants, which seems to have some bearing on the question, whether the captain had communicated to them his letter of instructions. They say: "You cannot expect, gentlemen, that we shall enter here into all the details of this business, which has been conducted by us, bona fide, with a view to your greatest benefit and advantage, faithfully relying on your promises, and considering the incomplete state of your instructions to us, that your captain was furnished with more particular orders."

There is a vagueness in these expressions, arising, probably, from the unskillfulness of the translation, if they were not written in our 258*] language, which *leaves it, in some measure, uncertain, whether the plaintiffs meant to assert, that the captain was furnished with more particular orders, or that they inferred this fact from the incomplete state of the instructions to themselves. If the case depended entirely on the question, it might, perhaps, be proper to refer to the original; but we do not think that the right of the defendants to the deduction they claim from the demand, depends entirely on the fact that their orders to their captain were shown to the plaintiffs. Their letter to the plaintiffs was at best equivocal; and any evidence showing that the construction which the plaintiffs put on that letter, conformed to the intention of the defendants, will justify the plaintiffs, although that evidence was not in their possession pending the transaction. The defendants cannot be permitted to say, "It is true, we did not intend to consign the Henry Clay to you, farther than was necessary to your agency in Amsterdam. We did not intend to give you any control over her voyage to St. Petersburg. We had committed that whole subject to our captain, and had given him precise orders respecting it. We had even gone so far as to direct him to disregard your consignment of the vessel, should you endeavor to make one. But you did not see these orders, and we will, therefore, make you responsible for not having understood our letter to you, as creating a duty which we did not intend it should create." This, certainly, cannot be permitted. As little can they be permitted to charge the Messrs. Willinks, in consequence of the *advice they gave, with [*259 the profits which might possibly have been made on the voyage to St. Petersburg. Although the orders were broken with their advice, still they were broken by the master, to whom their execution was confided, not by the Messrs. Willinks, to whom their execution had not been confided.

Were it even possible that the Messrs. Willinks could be made responsible in any form of action which could be devised, for the possible loss resulting from the breaking up of the voyage to St. Petersburg, they cannot, we think, be made responsible in this. Having loaded the Henry Clay at Amsterdam, clearly without authority, the cargo was shipped at their risk. The defendants might have refused it altogether. But they have sold it and received the money. This creates an assumpsit to pay the money received. This action, then, so far as respects the count for money received by the defendants to the plaintiffs' use, is founded on the transactions in Baltimore; and, were it even possible, which we are far from admitting, that the defendants could be allowed to make a deduction of this supposed loss, from the sum to be recovered on the count for money laid out and expended to their use, provided that count could be supported, yet they cannot be allowed to make that deduction from the sum to be recovered on the count for money had and received to the use of the plaintiffs, for goods sold as the goods of the plaintiffs.

*CERTIFICATE.—This cause came on to [*260 be heard on the transcript of the record of the Circuit Court, for the fourth Circuit and District of Maryland, and on the question on which the judges of said court were divided, and was argued by counsel. On consideration whereof, this court is of opinion, that the plaintiffs have a demand in law against the defendants, which can be maintained in the action now depending in the Circuit Court, and that the defendants are not entitled to a deduction from the same for the amount of any loss which may have been sustained by them by reason of the alteration in the destination of the ship Henry Clay to St. Petersburg, and the loading her at Amsterdam. Which opinion is directed to be certified to the Circuit Court.

[PRACTICE.]

GREEN v. WATKINS.

In real or personal actions, at common law, the death of parties, before judgment, abates the suit; and it requires the aid of some statutory provision, like that of the 31st section of the judiciary act of 1789, c. 20 to enable the suit to be prosecuted by, or against the personal representative or heir of the deceased, where the cause of action survives.

In writs of error upon judgments already rendered, in personal actions, if the plaintiff in error dies before assignment of errors, the writ abates at common law; but if, after assignment of errors, the defendant may join in error, and proceed to 261*] get the judgment affirmed, *if not erroneous, and may then revive it against the representatives of the plaintiff.

But a writ of error, in personal actions, does not abate by the death of the defendant in error, whether it happen before or after errors assigned; and the personal representatives may not only be admitted voluntarily to become parties, but a scire facias may issue to compel them.

By the rules of this court, if either party, in real or personal actions, die, pending the writ of error, his representatives in the personalty or realty, may voluntarily become parties, or may be compelled to become parties, in the manner prescribed by the rule.

Mr. B. Hardin, for the defendant in error, moved to dismiss the writ of error in this case, which was a real action, upon a suggestion of the death of the demandant and plaintiff in error, pending the proceedings in this court. He insisted that, at common law, the death of either party, any time before final judgment, would have abated the suit;<sup>1</sup> that the judiciary act of 1789, c. 20, s. 31, made no provision for this case, since it merely extended to the case of the death of parties, in personal actions, before judgment; and that the statute 17 Car. II., c. 8, and the act of Kentucky, showed the sense of Parliament and the local legislature, that real actions abated by the death of the parties, before judgment, upon writ of error on judgments already rendered.

Mr. Justice STORY delivered the opinion of the court:

The preliminary question which has been argued at the bar, is, whether the writ of error in this case, *which is a writ of right, [*262 has abated by the death of the demandant, who is the plaintiff in error, pending the proceedings in this court. There is a material distinction between the death of parties before judgment and after judgment, and while a writ of error is depending. In the former case, all personal actions by the common law abate; and it required the aid of some statute, like that of the thirty-first section of the judiciary act of 1789, ch. 20, to enable the action to be prosecuted by or against the personal representative of the deceased, when the cause of action survived. In real actions, the like principle prevails, for a still stronger reason, for, by the death of either party, the right descends to the heir, and a new cause of action springs up; and the plea is not, therefore, in the same condition as it was in the life-time of the party.

But, in cases of writs of error upon judgments already rendered, a different rule prevails. In personal actions, if the plaintiff in error dies before assignment of error, it is said that by the course of proceedings at common law, the writ abates; but if, after assignment of errors, it is otherwise. In this latter case, the defendant may join in error, and proceed to get the judgment affirmed, if not erroneous; and he may then revive it against the representatives of the plaintiff. But in no case does a writ of error in personal actions abate by the death of the defendant in error, whether it happen before or after errors assigned. If it

NOTE.—In real actions, the death of either party, before judgment, abates the suit. Sec. 31 of the judiciary act of 1789, which enables the action to be prosecuted by or against the representatives of the deceased, when the cause of action survives, is clearly confined to personal actions. Mackie v. Thomas, 7 Wheat. 530.

Upon the death of a complainant in equity only his legal representatives can revive the suit. An assignee cannot appear. Mitford, Eq. Pl. by Jeremy, 69; Story Eq. Pl., sec. 354, a; Barribeau v. Brant, 17 How. 43.

Upon the death of a party, the proceedings become abated or discontinued. Story Eq. Pl. s. 329.

The death of one of the parties to a suit does not, in all cases, necessarily produce such an abatement of it as to suspend all further proceedings; but only when the interest of such party, or that which he represents, survives. Cave v. Cork, 2 Younge & Coll. New R. 130, 133. If the interest of the party dying so determines that it can no longer affect the suit, and no person becomes entitled thereupon to the same interest (which happens in the case of a tenant for life, or a person having a temporary or contingent interest, or an interest defeasible upon a contingency), the suit does not so abate as to require any proceeding to warrant the prosecution of the suit against the remaining parties. Mitf. Eq. Pl. by Jeremy, 58, and cases there cited; Coop. Eq. Pl. 65.

But if the party so dying be the only plaintiff, or only defendant, there will necessarily be an end of the suit, if there be no subject of litigation remaining. Story Eq. Pl., sec. 356.

The death, or marriage, of one of the original parties to the suit, is the most common, if not the sole cause of the abatement of a suit in equity. As the interest of the plaintiff usually extends to the whole suit, therefore, in general, upon the death of the plaintiff, or the marriage of a female plaintiff, all proceedings become abated. Upon the death of a defendant, all proceedings become abated as to that defendant. Mitf. Eq. Pl. by Jeremy, 57, 58; Cooper Eq. Pl. 63.

If a suit abates by the death of the defendant, the plaintiff may bring a new original suit, or a bill of review, at his election. Wyatt, Pr. Reg. 91; Spencer v. Wray, 1 Vern. 463; Anon., 3 Atk. 485, 486; Nicoll v. Roosevelt, 3 John., ch. 60; Hardy v. Hull, 14 Simons, 21; Foster v. Foster, 16 Sim. 637; McCoul v. Le Kamp, 2 Wheat. 111.

But upon the marriage of a female defendant, the proceedings do not abate, though her husband should be named in the subsequent proceedings. Story Eq. Pl., sec. 354; Jones v. Skipworth, 9 Beav. 237.

If the defendant below marries after the judgment, and before the service of the writ of error, the service of the citation on the husband is sufficient. Fairfax v. Fairfax, 5 Cranch, 19.

When the representative of a deceased appellant did not appear after the lapse of two terms after the suggestion of his death, the suit was entered as abated. Barribeau v. Brant, 17 How. 43; so, when he did not appear in four years, the suit was abated and cause remanded. Philips v. Preston, 11 How. 294.

An appellee having died, on motion of his administrator, no counsel appearing for the appellant, the appeal was dismissed. Hook v. Linton, 10 Pet. 107. If one of two plaintiffs in error die, the action survives. McKinney v. Carroll, 12 Pet. 66. If one defendant in error die, before the term begins, and the cause of action survives, the death may be suggested and judgment taken against the survivor. McNutt v. Bland, 2 How. 9.

The death of one of the parties to the decree did not affect the right to have the decree executed. Penhallow v. Doanc, 3 Dall. 54.

happen before, and the plaintiff will not assign errors, the representatives of the defendant may have a scire facias quare executio non, in 263*] order to compel *him; if it happen after, they must proceed as if the defendants were living, till judgment be affirmed, and then revive by scire facias. And the plaintiff, in order to compel the representatives of the defendant in error to join in error, may sue out a scire facias ad audiendum errores, either generally, or naming them. Such is the doctrine of approved authorities.<sup>1</sup> It is clear, therefore, that at common law, in these cases, a writ of error does not necessarily abate: and that the personal representatives may not only be admitted voluntarily to become parties, but a scire facias may issue to require them to become parties. And such has been the practice hitherto adopted in this court in all personal actions, whether there has been an assignment of errors or not; for, a specific assignment of errors has never been insisted on here, as a preliminary to the argument, or decision of the cause.

In respect to real actions, this is the first time the question has presented itself upon a writ of error, where the death of either party has occurred pendente lite. There is no doubt that the heir or privy in estate, who is injured by an erroneous judgment, may prosecute a writ of error to reverse it. And there seems no good reason why, in case of the death of his ancestor, pending proceedings, he may not be admitted to become a party, or be cited to become a party, to pursue or defend the writ, in the same manner as in personal actions. The death of neither party produces any change in the 264*] condition *of the cause, or in the rights of the parties. It would seem reasonable, therefore, that the suit should proceed, and not be dismissed or abated. In the absence of all authority which binds the court to a different course, we are disposed to adopt this doctrine, and shall promulgate a general rule on the subject.

COHENS v. VIRGINIA.

This court has, constitutionally, appellate jurisdiction under the judiciary act of 1789, ch. 20, s. 25, from the final judgment or decree of the highest court of law or equity of a state, having jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the suit, where is drawn in question the validity of a treaty, or statute of, or an authority exercised under the United States, and the decision is against their validity; or where is drawn in question the validity of a statute of, or an authority exercised under any state, on the ground of their being repugnant to the constitution, treaties, or laws of the United States, and the decision is in favor of such, their validity; or of the constitution, or of a treaty, or statute of, or commission held under the United States, and the decision is against the title, right, privilege, or exemption, specially set up or claimed, by either party, under such clause of the constitution, treaty, statute, or commission.

It is no objection to the exercise of this appellate jurisdiction, that one of the parties is a state, and the other a citizen of that state.

*The act of Congress of the 4th of May, [265 1812, entitled, "an act further to amend the charter of the city of Washington," which provides (s. 6), that the corporation of the city shall be empowered, for certain purposes, and under certain restrictions, to authorize the drawing of lotteries, does not extend to authorize the corporation to force the sale of the tickets in such lottery, in states where such sale may be prohibited by the state laws.

THIS was a writ of error to the Quarterly Session Court for the borough of Norfolk, in the state of Virginia, under the 25th section of the judiciary act of 1789, c. 20, it being the highest court of law or equity of that state having jurisdiction of the case.

Pleas at the Court-House of Norfolk borough, before the Mayor, Recorder, and Aldermen of of the said borough, on Saturday, the second day of September, one thousand eight hundred and twenty, and in the forty-fifth year of the Commonwealth.

Be it remembered, that heretofore, to wit, at a Quarterly Session Court, held the twenty-sixth day of June, one thousand eight hundred and twenty, the grand jury, duly summoned and impaneled for the said borough of Norfolk, and sworn and charged according to law, made a presentment in these words:

We present P. J. and M. J. Cohen, for vending and selling two halves and four quarter lottery tickets of the National Lottery, to be drawn at Washington, to William H. Jennings, at their office at the corner of Maxwell's wharf, contrary to the act thus made and provided in that case, since January, 1820. On the information of William H. Jennings.

*Whereupon the regular process of [266 law was awarded against the said defendants, to answer the said presentment, returnable to the next succeeding term, which was duly returned by the sergeant of the borough of Norfolk—"Executed."

And at another Quarterly Session Court, held for the said borough of Norfolk, the twenty-ninth day of August, one thousand eight hundred and twenty, came, as well the attorney prosecuting for the Commonwealth, in this court, as the defendants, by their attorney, and on the motion of the said attorney, leave is given by the court to file an information against the defendants on the presentment aforesaid, which was accordingly filed, and is in these words:

Norfolk borough, to wit: Be it remembered, that James Nimmo, attorney for the commonwealth of Virginia, in the court of the said borough of Norfolk, cometh into court, in his proper person, and with leave of the court, giveth the said court to understand and be informed, that by an act of the General Assembly of the said commonwealth of Virginia, entitled, "An act to reduce into one, the several acts, and parts of acts, to prevent unlawful gaming." It is, among other things, enacted and declared, that no person or persons shall buy, or sell, within the said commonwealth, any lottery, or part or share of a lottery ticket, except in such lottery or lotteries as may be authorized by the laws thereof; and the said James Nimmo, as attorney aforesaid, further giveth the court to understand and be informed that P. J. & M. J. Cohen, traders and partners, late of the parish of Elizabeth River, and 267* borough of Norfolk aforesaid, being evil-disposed persons, and totally regardless of the laws and statutes of the said commonwealth, since the first day of January, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and twenty, that is to say, on the first day of June, in that year, and within the said commonwealth of Virginia, to wit, at the parish of Elizabeth River, in the said borough of Norfolk, and within the jurisdiction of this court, did then and there unlawfully vend, sell, and deliver to a certain William H. Jennings, two half lottery tickets, and four quarter lottery tickets of the National Lottery, to be drawn in the city of Washington, that being a lottery not authorized by the laws of this commonwealth, to the evil example of all other persons in the like case offending, and against the form of the act of the General Assembly, in that case made and provided.

JAMES NIMMO, for the Commonwealth.

And at this same Quarterly Session Court, continued by adjournment, and held for the said borough of Norfolk, the second day of September, eighteen hundred and twenty, came, as well the attorney prosecuting for the commonwealth, in this court, as the defendants by their attorney, and the said defendants, for plea, say, that they are not guilty in manner and form, as in the information against them is alleged, and of this they put themselves upon the country, and the attorney for the commonwealth doth the same; whereupon a case 268* was agreed by them to be argued in lieu of a special verdict, and is in these words:

Commonwealth against Cohens—case agreed.

In this case, the following statement is admitted and agreed by the parties in lieu of a special verdict: That the defendants, on the first day of June, in the year of our Lord eighteen hundred and twenty, within the borough of Norfolk, in the commonwealth of Virginia, sold to William H. Jennings a lottery ticket, in the lottery called, and denominated the National Lottery, to be drawn in the city of Washington, within the District of Columbia.

That the General Assembly of the state of Virginia enacted a statute, or act of Assembly, which went into operation on the first day of January, in the year of our Lord 1820, and which is still unrepealed, in the words following:

No person, in order to raise money for himself or another, shall, publicly or privately, put up a lottery to be drawn or adventured for, or any prize or thing to be raffled or played for. And whosoever shall offend herein, shall forfeit the whole sum of money proposed to be raised by such lottery, raffling or playing, to be recovered by action of debt, in the name of anyone who shall sue for the same, or by indictment or information in the name of the commonwealth, in either case, for the use and benefit of the literary fund. Nor shall any person or persons buy, or sell, within this commonwealth, any lottery ticket, or part or share of a lottery ticket, except in such lottery or lotteries as may be authorized by the laws thereof; and any person or persons [*269 offending herein, shall forfeit and pay, for every such offense, the sum of one hundred dollars, to be recovered and appropriated in manner last aforesaid.

That the Congress of the United States, enacted a statute on the 3d day of May, in the year of our Lord 1802, entitled, an act, &c., in the words and figures following:

An Act to incorporate the inhabitants of the city of Washington, in the District of Columbia.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled, That the inhabitants of the city of Washington be constituted a body politic and corporate, by the name of a Mayor and Council of the city of Washington, and by their corporate name may sue and be sued, implead and be impleaded, grant, receive, and do all other acts as natural persons, and may purchase and hold real, personal and mixed property, or dispose of the same for the benefit of the said city; and may have and use a city seal, which may be altered at pleasure. The city of Washington shall be divided into three divisions or wards, as now divided by the levy court for the county, for the purposes of assessment, but the number may be increased hereafter, as in the wisdom of the city council shall seem most conducive to the general interest and convenience.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the council of the city of Washington shall consist of twelve members, residents of the [*270 city, and upwards of twenty-five years of age, to be divided into two chambers; the first chamber to consist of seven members, and the second chamber of five members; the second chamber to be chosen from the whole number of councillors, elected by their joint ballot. The city council to be elected annually by ballot, in a general ticket, by the free white male inhabitants of full age, who have resided twelve months in the city, and paid taxes therein the year preceding the elections being held; the justices of the county of Washington, resident in the city, or any three of them, to preside as judges of election, with such associates as the council may from time to time appoint.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the first election of members of the city council, shall be held on the first Monday in June next, and in every year afterwards, at such place in each ward as the judges of the election may prescribe.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the polls shall be kept open from eight o'clock in the morning till seven o'clock in the evening, and no longer, for the reception of ballots. On the closing of the poll, the judges shall close and seal their ballot-boxes, and meet on the day following, in the presence of the marshal of the district, on the first election, and the council afterwards; when the seal shall be broken, and the votes counted; within three days after such election, they shall give notice to the persons having the greatest number of legal votes, that they are duly elected, and shall make their return to the mayor of the city.

271*] *SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That the mayor of the city shall be appointed annually by the President of the United States; he must be a citizen of the United States, and a resident of the city prior to his appointment.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That the city council shall hold their sessions in the city hall, or until such building is erected, in such place as the mayor may provide for that purpose, on the second Monday in June, in each year; but the mayor may convene them oftener, if the public good require their deliberations; three-fourths of the members of each council, may be a quorum to do business, but a smaller number may adjourn from day to day; they may compel the attendance of absent members in such manner, and under such penalties, as they may, by ordinance, provide; they shall appoint their respective presidents, who shall preside during their sessions, and shall vote on all questions where there is an equal division; they shall settle their rules of proceedings, appoint their own officers, regulate their respective fees, and remove them at pleasure; they shall judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of their own members, and may, with the concurrence of three-fourths of the whole, expel any member for disorderly behavior, or malconduct in office, but not a second time for the same offense; they shall keep a journal of their proceedings, and enter the yeas and nays on any question, resolve or ordinance, at the request of any member, and their deliberations shall be public. The mayor shall appoint to all offices under the corporation. All ordi-
272*] nances *or acts passed by the city council, shall be sent to the mayor for his approbation, and when approved by him, shall then be obligatory as such. But, if the said mayor shall not approve of such ordinance or act, he shall return the same within five days, with his reasons in writing therefor; and if three-fourths of both branches of the city council, on reconsideration thereof, approve of the same, it shall be in force in like manner as if he had approved it, unless the city council, by their adjournment, prevent its return.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That the corporation aforesaid shall have full power and authority to pass all by-laws and ordinances to prevent and remove nuisances; to prevent the introduction of contagious diseases within the city; to establish night watches or patrols, and erect lamps; to regulate the stationing, anchorage, and mooring of vessels; to provide for licensing and regulating auctions, retailers of liquors, hackney carriages, wagons, carts and drays, and pawn-brokers within the city; to restrain or prohibit gambling, and to provide for licensing, regulating, or restraining theatrical or other public amusements within the city; to regulate and establish markets; to erect and repair bridges; to keep in repair all necessary streets, avenues, drains and sewers, and to pass regulations necessary for the preservation of the same, agreeably to the plan of the said city; to provide for the safe keeping of the standard of weights and measures fixed by Congress, and for the regulation of all weights and measures used in the city; to provide sweeping of chimneys, and fixing the rates thereof; to establish and regulate fire wards and fire companies; to regulate and establish the size of bricks that are to be made and used in the city; to sink wells, and erect and repair pumps in the streets; to impose and appropriate fines, penalties and forfeitures for breach of their ordinances; to lay and collect taxes; to enact by-laws for the prevention and extinguishment of fires; and to pass all ordinances necessary to give effect and operation to all the powers vested in the corporation of the city of Washington; Provided, That the by-laws, or ordinances of the said corporation, shall be in no wise obligatory upon the persons of non-residents of the said city, unless in cases of intentional violation of the by-laws or ordinances previously promulgated. All the fines, penalties and forfeitures imposed by the corporation of the city of Washington, if not exceeding twenty dollars, shall be recovered before a single magistrate, as small debts are by law recoverable; and if such fines, penalties and forfeitures, exceed the sum of twenty dollars, the same shall be recovered by action of debt, in the District Court of Columbia, for the county of Washington, in the name of the corporation, and for the use of the city of Washington.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That the person or persons appointed to collect any tax imposed in virtue of the powers granted by this act, shall have authority to collect the same, by distress and sale of the goods and chattels of the person chargeable therewith; no sale shall be made, unless ten days' *previous [274 notice thereof be given; no law shall be passed by the city council subjecting vacant or unimproved city lots, or parts of lots, to be sold for taxes.

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That the city council shall provide for the support of the poor, infirm and diseased of the city.

SEC. 10. Provided always, and be it further enacted, That no tax shall be imposed by the city council on real property in the said city, at any higher rate than three-quarters of one per centum, on the assessment valuation of such property.

SEC. 11. And be it further enacted, That this act shall be in force for two years from the passing thereof, and from thence to the end of the next session of Congress thereafter, and no longer.

And another act, on the 23d day of February, 1804, entitled, "An act supplementary to an act, entitled, an act to incorporate the inhabitants of the city of Washington, in the District of Columbia."

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled, That the act, entitled, An act to incorporate the inhabitants of the city of Washington, in the District of Columbia, except so much of the same as is consistent with the provisions of this act, be, and the same is hereby continued in force, for and during the term of fifteen years from the end of the next session of Congress.

SEC. 12. And be it further enacted, That the council of the city of Washington, from and after the *period for which the members [275 of the present council have been elected, shall consist of two chambers, each of which shall be composed of nine members, to be chosen by distinct ballots, according to the directions of the act to which this is a supplement; a majority of each chamber shall constitute a quorum to do business. In case vacancies shall occur in the council, the chamber in which the same may happen, shall supply the same by an election by ballot, from the three persons next highest on the list to those elected at the preceding election, and a majority of the whole number of the chamber in which such vacancy may happen, shall be necessary to make an election.

SEC. 13. And be it further enacted, That the council shall have power to establish and regulate the inspection of flour, tobacco, and salted provisions, the gauging of casks and liquors, the storage of gunpowder, and all naval and military stores, not the property of the United States, to regulate the weight and quality of bread, to tax and license hawkers and peddlers, to restrain or prohibit tippling houses, lotteries, and all kinds of gaming; to superintend the health of the city; to preserve the navigation of the Potomac and Anacostia rivers adjoining the city, to erect, repair, and regulate public wharves, and to deepen docks and basins; to provide for the establishment and superintendence of public schools; to license and regulate, exclusively, hackney coaches, ordinary keepers, retailers and ferries; to provide for the appointment of inspectors, constables, and such other officers as may be necessary to execute 276* the *laws of the corporation, and to give such compensation to the mayor of the city as they may deem fit.

SEC. 14. And be it further enacted, That the Levy Court of the county of Washington shall not hereafter possess the power of imposing any tax on the inhabitants of the city of Washington."

That the Congress of the United States, on the 4th day of May, in the year of our Lord 1812, enacted another statute, entitled, "An act further to amend the charter of the city of Washington."

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled, That from and after the first Monday in June next, the corporation of the city of Washington shall be composed of a mayor, a board of aldermen, and a board of common council, to be elected by ballot, as hereafter directed. The board of aldermen shall consist of eight members, to be elected for two years, two to be residents of, and chosen from, each ward, by the qualified voters therein; and the board of common council shall consist of twelve members, to be elected for one year; three to be residents of, and chosen from, each ward, in manner aforesaid; and each board shall meet at the council chamber on the second Monday in June next (for the despatch of business), at ten o'clock in the morning, and on the same day, and at the same hour, annually, thereafter. A majority of each board shall be necessary to form a quorum to do business, but a less number may adjourn from day to day. The board of aldermen, im- 277* mediately after they shall *have assembled in consequence of the first election, shall divide themselves by lot into two classes; the seats of the first class shall be vacated at the expiration of one year, and the seats of the second class shall be vacated at the expiration of two years, so that one-half may be chosen every year. Each board shall appoint its own president from among its own members, who shall preside during the sessions of the board, and shall have a casting vote on all questions where there is an equal division; provided such equality shall not have been occasioned by his previous vote.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That no person shall be eligible to a seat in the board of aldermen or board of common council, unless he shall be more than twenty-five years of age, a free white male citizen of the United States, and shall have been a resident of the city of Washington one whole year next preceding the day of the election; and shall, at the time of his election, be a resident of the ward for which he shall be elected, and possessed of a freehold estate in the said city of Washington, and shall have been assessed two months preceding the day of election. And every free white male citizen of lawful age, who shall have resided in the city of Washington for the space of one year next preceding the day of election, and shall be a resident of the ward in which he shall offer to vote, and who shall have been assessed on the books of the corporation, not less than two months prior to the day of election, shall be qualified to vote for members to serve in the said board of aldermen and board of common *council, and no other person whatever [*278 shall exercise the right of suffrage at such election.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the present mayor of the city of Washington shall be, and continue such, until the second Monday in June next, on which day, and on the second Monday in June annually thereafter, the mayor of the said city shall be elected by ballot of the board of aldermen and board of common council, in joint meeting, and a majority of the votes of all the members of both boards shall be necessary to a choice; and if there should be an equality of votes between two persons after the third ballot, the two Houses shall determine by lot. He shall, before he enters upon the duties of his office, take an oath or affirmation in the presence of both boards, "lawfully to execute the duties of his office to the best of his skill and judgment, without favor or partiality." He shall, ex officio, have, and exercise all the powers, authority, and jurisdiction of a justice of the peace, for the county of Washington, within the said county. He shall nominate, and with the consent of a majority of the members of the board of aldermen, appoint to all offices under the corporation (except the commissioners of elections), and every such officer shall be removed from office on the concurrent remonstrance of a majority of the two boards. He shall see that the laws of the corporation be duly executed, and shall report the negligence or misconduct of any officer to the two boards. He shall appoint proper persons to fill up all vacancies during the recess of the board of aldermen, to hold such *appointment until the end [*279 of the then ensuing session. He shall have power to convene the two boards, when, in his opinion, the good of the community may require it, and he shall lay before them from time to time, in writing, such alterations in the laws of the corporation as he shall deem necessary and proper, and shall receive for his services annually, a just and reasonable compensation, to be allowed and fixed by the two boards, which shall neither be increased or diminished during the period for which he shall have been elected. Any person shall be eligible to the office of mayor, who is a free white male citizen of the United States, who shall have attained to the age of thirty years, and who shall be a bona fide owner of a freehold estate in the said city, and shall have been a resident in the said city two years immediately preceding his election, and no other person shall be eligible to the said office. In case of the refusal of any person to accept the office of mayor, upon his election thereto, or of his death, resignation, inability or removal from the city, the said two boards shall elect another in his place, to serve the remainder of the year.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the first election for members of the board of aldermen, and board of common council, shall be held on the first Monday in June next, and on the first Monday in June annually thereafter. The first election to be held by three commissioners, to be appointed in each ward by the mayor of the city, and at such place in each ward as he may direct; and all subsequent elections shall be held by a like number 280* of commissioners, to be appointed in each ward by the two boards, in joint meeting, which several appointments, except the first, shall be at least ten days previous to the day of each election. And it shall be the duty of the mayor for the first election, and of the commissioners for all subsequent elections, to give at least five days' public notice of the place in each ward where such elections are to be held. The said commissioners shall, before they receive any ballot, severally take the following oath or affirmation, to be administered by the mayor of the city, or any justice of the peace for the county of Washington: "I, A. B., do solemnly swear or affirm (as the case may be), that I will truly and faithfully receive, and return the votes of such persons as are by law entitled to vote for members of the board of aldermen, and board of common council, in ward No.—, according to the best of my judgment and understanding, and that I will not, knowingly, receive or return the vote of any person who is not legally entitled to the same, so help me God." The polls shall be opened at ten o'clock in the morning, and be closed at seven o'clock in the evening, of the same day. Immediately on closing the polls, the commissioners of each ward, or a majority of them, shall count the ballots, and make out under their hands and seals a correct return of the two persons for the first election, and of the one person for all subsequent elections, having the greatest number of legal votes, together with the number of votes given to each, as members of the board of aldermen; and of the three persons having the greatest number of legal 281* votes, together with the number of votes given to each, as members of the board of common council. And the two persons at the first election, and the one person at all subsequent elections, having the greatest number of legal votes for the board of aldermen; and the three persons having the greatest number of legal votes for the board of common council, shall be duly elected; and in all cases of an equality of votes, the commissioners shall decide by lot. The said returns shall be delivered to the mayor of the city, on the succeeding day, who shall cause the same to be published in some newspaper printed in the city of Washington. A duplicate return, together with a list of the persons who voted at such election, shall also be made by the said commissioners, to the register of the city; on the day succeeding the election, who shall preserve and record the same, and shall, within two days thereafter, notify the several persons so returned, of their election; and each board shall judge of the legality of the elections, returns and qualifications of its own members, and shall supply vacancies in its own body, by causing elections to be made to fill the same, in the ward, and for the board in which such vacancies shall happen, giving at least five days' notice previous thereto; and each board shall have full power to pass all rules necessary and requisite to enable itself to come to a just decision in cases of a contested election of its own members; and the several members of each board shall, before entering upon the duties of their office, take the following oath or affirmation: *"I do swear (or solemnly, sincerely, [*282 and truly affirm and declare, as the case may be), that I will faithfully execute the office of to the best of my knowledge and ability," which oath or affirmation shall be administered by the mayor, or some justice of the peace, for the county of Washington.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That in addition to the powers heretofore granted to the corporation of the city of Washington, by an act, entitled, "An act to incorporate the inhabitants of the city of Washington, in the District of Columbia," and an act, entitled, "An act, supplementary to an act, entitled, an act to incorporate the inhabitants of the city of Washington, in the District of Columbia," the said corporation shall have power to lay taxes on particular wards, parts, or sections of the city, for their particular local improvements.

That after providing for all objects of a general nature, the taxes raised on the assessable property in each ward, shall be expended therein, and in no other; in regulating, filling up, and repairing of streets and avenues, building of bridges, sinking of wells, erecting pumps, and keeping them in repair; in conveying water in pumps, and in the preservation of springs; in erecting and repairing wharves; in providing fire engines and other apparatus for the extinction of fires, and for other local improvements and purposes, in such manner as the said board of aldermen and board of common council shall provide; but the sums raised for the support of the poor, *aged and infirm, [*283 shall be a charge on each ward in proportion to its population or taxation, as the two boards shall decide. That whenever the proprietors of two-thirds of the inhabited houses, fronting on both sides of a street, or part of a street, shall by petition to the two branches, express the desire of improving the same, by laying the curb-stone of the foot pavement, and paving the gutters or carriageway thereof, or otherwise improving said street, agreeably to its graduation, the said corporation shall have power to cause to be done at any expense, not exceeding two dollars and fifty cents per front foot, of the lots fronting on such improved street or part of a street, and charge the same to the owners of the lots fronting on said street, or part of a street, in due proportion; and also on a like petition to provide for erecting lamps for lighting any street or part of a street, and to defray the expense thereof by a tax on the proprietors or inhabitants of such houses, in proportion to their rental or valuation, as the two boards shall decide.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That the said corporation shall have full power and authority to erect and establish hospitals or pest-houses, work-houses, houses of correction, penitentiary, and other public buildings for the use of the city, and to lay and collect taxes for the defraying the expenses thereof; to regulate party and other fences, and to determine by whom the same shall be made and kept in repair; to lay open streets, avenues, lanes and alleys, and to regulate or prohibit all inclosures thereof, and to occupy and improve for public 284* purposes, by *and with the consent of the President of the United States, any part of the public and open spaces or squares in said city, not interfering with any private rights; to regulate the measurement of, and weight, by which all articles brought into the city for sale shall be disposed of; to provide for the appointment of appraisers, and measurers of builders' work and materials, and also of wood, coal, grain and lumber; to restrain and prohibit the nightly and other disorderly meetings of slaves, free negroes and mulattoes, and to punish such slaves by whipping, not exceeding forty stripes, or by imprisonment not exceeding six calendar months, for any one offense; and to punish such free negroes and mulattoes for such offenses, by fixed penalties, not exceeding twenty dollars for any one offense; and in case of inability of any such free negro or mulatto to pay and satisfy any such penalty and costs thereon, to cause such free negro or mulatto to be confined to labor for such reasonable time, not exceeding six calendar months, for any one offense, as may be deemed equivalent to such penalty and costs; to cause all vagrants, idle or disorderly persons, all persons of evil life or ill-fame, and all such as have no visible means of support, or are likely to become chargeable to the city as paupers, or are found begging or drunk in or about the streets or loitering in or about tippling houses, or who can show no reasonable cause of business or employment in the city; and all suspicious persons, and all who have no fixed place of residence, or cannot give a good account of themselves, all eaves-droppers and night-walkers, all who 285* are guilty of open profanity, or grossly indecent language or behaviour publicly in the streets, all public prostitutes, and such as lead a notoriously lewd or lascivious course of life, and all such as keep public gaming tables, or gaming houses, to give security for their good behavior for a reasonable time, and to indemnify the city against any charge for their support, and in case of their refusal or inability to give such security, to cause them to be confined to labor for a limited time, not exceeding one year at a time, unless such security should be sooner given. But if they shall afterwards be found again offending, such security may be again required, and for want thereof, the like proceedings may again be had, from time to time, as often as may be necessary; to prescribe the terms and conditions upon which free negroes and mulattoes, and others who can show no visible means of support, may reside in the city; to cause the avenues, streets, lanes and alleys to be kept clean, and to appoint officers for that purpose. To authorize the drawing of lotteries for effecting any important improvement in the city, which the ordinary funds or revenue thereof will not accomplish. Provided, That the amount to be raised in each year shall not exceed the sum of ten thousand dollars. And provided also, that the object for which the money is intended to be raised, shall be first submitted to the President of the United States, and shall be approved of by him. To take care of, preserve and regulate the several burying-grounds within the city; to provide for registering of births, deaths and marriages; to cause abstracts or minutes *of all transfers of real prop- [*286 erty, both freehold and leasehold, to be lodged in the registry of the city, at stated periods; to authorize night watches and patrols, and the taking up and confining by them, in the night time, of all suspected persons; to punish by law corporally any servant or slave guilty of a breach of any of their by-laws or ordinances, unless the owner or holder of such servant or slave shall pay the fine annexed to the offense; and to pass all laws which shall be deemed necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested in the corporation, or any of its officers, either by this act, or any former act.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That the marshal of the District of Columbia shall receive, and safely keep, within the jail for Washington county, at the expense of the city, all persons committed thereto under the sixth section of this act, until other arrangements be made by the corporation for the confinement of offenders, within the provisions of the said section; and in all cases where suit shall be brought before a justice of the peace, for the recovery of any fine or penalty arising or incurred for a breach of any by-law or ordinance of the corporation, upon a return of "nulla bona" to any fiery facias issued against the property of the defendant or defendants, it shall be the duty of the clerk of the Circuit Court for the county of Washington, when required, to issue a writ of capias ad satisfaciendum against every such defendant, returnable to the next Circuit Court for the county of Washington thereafter, *and which shall be proceeded [*287 on as in other writs of the like kind.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That unimproved lots in the city of Washington, on which two years' taxes remain due and unpaid, or so much thereof as may be necessary to pay such taxes, may be sold at public sale for such taxes due thereon. Provided, that public notice be given of the time and place of sale, by advertising in some newspaper printed in the city of Washington, at least six months, where the property belongs to persons residing out of the United States; three months where the property belongs to persons residing in the United States, but without the limits of the District of Columbia; and six weeks where the property belongs to persons residing within the District of Columbia or city of Washington; in which notice shall be stated the number of the lot or lots, the number of the square or squares, the name of the person or persons to whom the same may have been assessed, and also the amount of taxes due thereon. And provided, also, that the purchaser shall not be obliged to pay at the time of such sale, more than the taxes due, and the expenses of sale; and that, if within two years from the day of such sale, the proprietor or proprietors of such lot or lots, or his or their heirs, representatives, or agents, shall repay to such purchaser the moneys paid for the taxes and expenses as aforesaid, together with ten per centum per annum as interest thereon, or make a tender of the same, he shall be re-instated in his original right and title; but if no such payment or tender be made 288*] *within two years next after the said sale, then the purchaser shall pay the balance of the purchase money of such lot or lots into the city treasury, where it shall remain subject to the order of the original proprietor or proprietors, his or their heirs, or legal representatives; and the purchaser shall receive a title in fee-simple to the said lot or lots, under the hand of the mayor, and seal of the corporation, which shall be deemed good and valid in law and equity.

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That the said corporation shall, in future, be named and styled, "the mayor, aldermen, and common council of the city of Washington;" and that if there shall have been a non-election or informality of a city council, on the first Monday in June last, it shall not be taken, construed, or adjudged, in any manner, to have operated as a dissolution of the said corporation, or to affect any of its rights, privileges, or laws passed previous to the second Monday in June last, but the same are hereby declared to exist in full force.

SEC. 10. And be it further enacted, That the corporation shall, from time to time, cause the several wards of the city to be so located as to give, as nearly as may be, an equal number of votes to each ward; and it shall be the duty of the register of the city, or such officer as the corporation may hereafter appoint, to furnish the commissioners of election for each ward, on the first Monday in June, annually, previous to the opening of the polls, a list of the persons having a right to vote, agreeably to the provisions of the second section of this act.

289*] *SEC. 11. And it be further enacted, That so much of any former act as shall be repugnant to the provisions of this act, be, and the same is hereby repealed.

Which statutes are still in force and unrepealed. That the lottery, denominated the national lottery, before mentioned, the ticket of which was sold by the defendants as aforesaid, was duly created by the said corporation of Washington, and the drawing thereof, and the sale of the said ticket, was duly authorized by the said corporation, for the objects and purposes, and in the mode directed by the said statute of the Congress of the United States.

If, upon this case, the court shall be of opinion, that the acts of Congress before mentioned were valid, and on the true construction of these acts, the lottery ticket sold by the said defendants as aforesaid, might lawfully be sold within the state of Virginia, notwithstanding the act or statute of the general assembly of Virginia prohibiting such sale, then judgment to be entered for the defendants. But if the court should be of opinion, that the statute or act of the general assembly of the state of Virginia, prohibiting such sale, is valid, notwithstanding the said acts of Congress, then judgment to be entered, that the defendants are guilty, and that the commonwealth recover against them one hundred dollars and costs.

Taylor, for defendants.

And thereupon the matters of law arising upon the said case agreed being argued, it seems to the court here, that the law is for the commonwealth, and *that the defend- [*290 ants are guilty in manner and form, as in the information against them is alleged, and they do assess their fine to one hundred dollars besides the costs. Therefore, it is considered by the court, that the commonwealth recover against the said defendants, to the use of the president and directors of the literary fund, one hundred dollars, the fine by the court aforesaid, in manner aforesaid assessed, and the costs of this prosecution, and the said defendants may be taken, &c.

From which judgment the defendants, by their counsel, prayed an appeal to the next Superior Court of law of Norfolk county, which was refused by the court, inasmuch as cases of this sort are not subject to revision by any other court of the commonwealth. Commonwealth's costs, $31.50.

Mr. Barbour, for the defendant in error, moved to dismiss the writ of error in this case, and stated three grounds upon which he should insist that the court had not jurisdiction: (1) Because of the subject-matter of the controversy, without reference to the parties. (2) That considering the character of one of the parties, if the court could have jurisdiction at all, it must be original, and not appellate. (3) And, finally, that it can take neither original nor appellate jurisdiction.

1. As to the first point, it is conceded by all, that the federal government is one of limited powers. This distinguishing trait equally characterizes all its departments; it is with the judicial department only that the present inquiry is connected. It is in the *2d section [*291 of the 3d article of the constitution that we find an enumeration of the objects to which the judicial power of the Union extends. That part of it which relates to the present discussion, declares, that "the judicial power shall extend to all cases in law and equity, arising under this constitution, the laws of the United States, and treaties made, or which shall be made, under their authority." It is not pretended, that any treaty has any sort of relation to the present case; before, then, this court can take jurisdiction, it must be shown that this is a case arising either under the constitution, or a law of the United States. I shall endeavor to prove that it does not belong to either description. These two classes of cases are obviously put in contradistinction to each other; and there will be no difficulty in showing to the court the difference in their character. The constitution contains two different kinds of provisions; the one (if I may use the expression), self-executed, or capable of self-execution; the other, only executory, and requiring legislative enactment to give them operation; thus, the 2d section of the 4th article, which declares, that "the citizens of each state shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several states;" the 10th section of the 1st article, which prohibits any state from making anything but gold and silver coin, a tender in payment of debts; from passing any law "impairing the obligation of contracts;" and the prohibition to Congress, in the 9th section, and to the states in the 10th section of the same article, to pass "any bill of attainder, or ex post facto law," *are all examples of the self-executed provisions of the constitution; by which, I mean to say that the constitution, in these instances, is, per se, operative, without the aid of legislation. On the contrary, the various provisions of the 8th section of the same article, such, for example, "as the power to establish an uniform system of naturalization, and uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcy," are executory only; that is, without an act of legislation, they have no operative effect.

The cases, then, arising under the constitution, are those which arise under its self-executed provisions; and those arising under the laws of the United States, are those which occur under some law, passed in virtue of the executory provisions of the constitution. If this idea be correct, then this is not a case arising under the constitution; and it does not correspond with the other part of the description, that is, it does not arise under a law of the United States. In the first place, this court, in the case of Hepburn v. Elzy,<sup>1</sup> decided, that the District of Columbia was not a state, within the meaning of the constitution, and that, therefore, a citizen of that district could not sustain an action against a citizen of Virginia, in the Circuit Court of that state. Now, it would sound curiously, to call a law passed for a district, not itself exalted to the dignity of a state, a law of the United States. It would seem more strange to call a law passed by the corporation of Washington, for the local purposes of Washington, *a law of the United States, and yet such is the character of the law under which this case arises; for the act of Congress did not itself create the lottery, but authorized the corporation of Washington to do it.

As to this sub-legislation, legislative power is a trust which cannot be transferred. Delegatus non potest delegare. If this can be exercised by substitution, other legislative powers can also. I would then inquire, whether in execution of the power "to lay and collect taxes," "to declare war," &c., Congress could authorize the state legislatures to do these things. It is a misnomer, to call by the name of a law of the United States, any act passed for the District of Columbia, though enacted by Congress, without calling in the aid of a corporation. It has been well observed by a former member of this court, that every citizen in the United States sustains a two-fold political character, one in relation to the federal, the other in relation to the state governments. To put the proposition in other words, it may be stated thus: A two-fold system of legislation pervades the United States; the one of which I will call federal, the other municipal. The first belongs by the constitution of the United States to Congress, and consists of the powers of war, peace, commerce, negotiation, and those general powers which make up our external relations, together with a few powers of an internal kind, which require uniformity in their operation; the second belongs to the states, and consists of whatever is not included in the first, embracing particularly everything connected with the internal police and economy of the several states. If this system knew no exception in its operation, the present question would never have arisen; for no man would ever dream of calling a law of Virginia or Maryland, a law of the United States. But there are certain portions of territory within the United States, of which the District of Columbia is one, in which there is no state government to act; in relation to these, Congress, by the constitution, exercises not only federal, but municipal legislation also; and as the whole difficulty in this case has arisen out of this blending together of two different kinds of legislative power, so, that difficulty will be removed by a careful attention to the difference in the nature and character of these powers, and the extent of their operation respectively. Whenever a question arises, whether a law passed by Congress is a law of the United States, we have only to inquire whether it is constitutionally passed in execution of any of the federal powers; if it be, it is properly a law of the United States; since the federal powers are co-extensive with the limits of the United States, and this, though the particular act may be confined to certain persons, places or things. Thus, a law establishing federal courts in a particular state, is a law of the United States; for though its immediate operation is upon one state, yet it is in execution of a power co-extensive with the United States; but if a law, though passed by Congress, be passed in execution of a municipal power, as a law to pave the streets of Washington, then it cannot, in any propriety of language, *be called a law of the United States. It is an axiom in politics, that legislative power has no operation, beyond the territorial limits under its authority. I do not now speak of the doctrine of the lex loci; of that comity, by which the different states of the civilized world receive the laws of others, as governing, in certain cases of contract, or questions of a civil nature. I speak of the intrinsic energy of the legislative power, its operation per se.

If this principle be true, is there anything in this case to impair its force? It is admitted on all hands, that this law was passed in virtue of the power given by the constitution to exercise exclusive legislation, over such district, not exceeding ten miles square, as should become the seat of the federal government. If we look into the history of the country, the debates of the conventions, or the declarations of the Federalist, we shall alike arrive at the conclusion, that this power was given in consequence of an incident which had occurred in Philadelphia, and the necessity which thence seemed to result, of Congress deliberating uninterrupted and unawed. The motive, then, for granting this power, would not lead to an extension of it; still less will the terms; for, they are as restrictive as could by possibility be used. The district shall not exceed ten miles square, and as was argued in the convention of Virginia, may not exceed one mile. So far from the principle being impaired, then, it is greatly strengthened by the language of this provision. See to what consequences we should be led by the doctrine, that because this lottery was authorized by 296* Congress, therefore the tickets *might be sold in any state, against its laws, with impunity. The same charter authorizes the corporation of Washington to grant licenses to auctioneers and retailers of spirituous liquors. Now, upon the doctrines contended for, what will hinder the corporation from granting licenses to persons, to vend goods and liquors in Virginia, by a corporation license, contrary to the laws of Virginia? and thus greatly impair the revenue which the state raises from these licenses; as it is said, that a saleable quality is of the essence, and constitutes the only value of a lottery ticket, and that therefore it is not competent to any state to abridge the value of that, which was rightfully created by the legislature of the Union? Would not the same reasoning justify the holders of these corporation licenses, equally to trample upon the laws of the state; lest, for want of a market, their merchandise and liquors might not be sold, and thus the value of their license diminished. These are cases in which the revenue of a state would be impaired, as well as the laws for the protection of its morals. Such is the law of Virginia, prohibiting the use of billiard tables. If Congress should authorize licenses to be issued, by the corporation of Washington, for using them, and if this law have an operation beyond the territorial limits of the district, then has Virginia lost all power of regulating the conduct of her own citizens.

The solution of the whole difficulty lies in this: That though the laws of Congress, when passed in execution of a federal power, extend over the Union, and being laws of the United 297* States, are a part of *the supreme law of the land, yet, a law passed like the one in question, in execution of the power of municipal legislation, extends only so far as the power under which it was passed—that is, to the boundaries of the district; that, therefore, it is no law of the United States, and consequently not a part of the supreme law of the land. Nor is there anything novel in the idea of two powers residing in the same body, at the same time, and over the same subject, of a different kind. The idea is familiarly illustrated by cases of ordinary occurrence in the judiciary. For the same trespass, an action, or indictment, may be brought before the same court, and a different judgment pronounced, as one or the other mode is pursued. So the same court has frequently common law and chancery jurisdiction, and pronounces a different judgment in relation to the same subject, as they are exercising the one or the other jurisdiction.

Let us look further at the consequences of calling the laws of the district, laws of the United States. By the sixth article of the constitution, laws of the United States, made in pursuance of the constitution, are declared a part of the supreme law of the land, and the judges in every state shall be bound thereby, anything in the laws of their state to the contrary notwithstanding. If, then, laws of the district be laws of the United States, within the meaning of the constitution, it will follow, that they may be carried to the extent of an interference with every department of state legislation; and whenever they shall so interfere, they are to be considered *of paramount [*298 authority. Suppose the law of Virginia to declare a deed for land void against a purchaser for valuable consideration, without notice, unless recorded upon the party's acknowledgment, or the evidence of three witnesses. Suppose a law of the district to dispense with record, or to be satisfied with two witnesses. If one citizen should convey to another citizen of the district, land lying in Virginia, in conformity with the district law, upon the principle now contended for, the party must recover, in the teeth of the law of Virginia. It will be admitted, that a law passed, like the one in question, by one state, might be repelled by another; it will, also, be admitted, that if Congress had (as some think they have a right to do, but in which I do not concur) established here a local legislature, which had passed the law in question, its effects might have been repelled from the states by penal sanctions.

But if it be said, that as the dominion over the district flows from the same source with every other power possessed by the government of the Union, as it is executed by the same Congress, as it was created for the common good, and for universal purposes, that it must be of equal obligation throughout the Union in its effects, with any power known to the constitution; from whence it is inferred, that the law in question can encounter no geographical impediments, but that its march is through the Union. The answer is, that the federal powers of Congress, in their execution, encounter no geographical impediments, because no limits, short of the boundaries *of the Union, [*299 are prescribed to them; but the legislative power over the district, in its execution, does encounter geographical impediments, because the limits of the district are distinctly prescribed, as the bound of its extent, and as an insurmountable barrier to its further march.

It may be said, too, that this case bears no resemblance to that of one state repelling, by penal sanctions, the effects of the laws of another; because it is said, one state is no party to the laws of another; whereas here, the law is its own law, as being represented in Congress, and thereby contributing to its passage, and capable in part of effecting its repeal. It will be seen at once, that this principle would prove too much, and, therefore, that it cannot be a sound one; for if the states are to acquiesce in this instance, because they are represented in Congress, and have, therefore, an agency in making and repealing laws, the same reasoning would justify Congress in legislating beyond their delegated powers; for example, prescribing a general course of descents. It is obvious, that they might contribute as much to the passage and repeal of this law, as any other, and yet this ground will not be attempted to be sustained. If, then, they are not bound, because of their representation in Congress, to acquiesce in the assumption of a power not granted, they are surely as little bound, upon that ground, to permit a power, confined to ten miles square, to extend its operation with the limits of the United States.

If, then, the law in question is not a law of the United States, in the sense of that expression in the *constitution, this is not a case arising under the law of the United States, and, consequently, the jurisdiction of this court fails as to the subject-matter.

2. My second proposition is, that if this court could entertain jurisdiction of the case at all, it must be original, and not appellate jurisdiction. This has reference to the character of one of the parties in the present contest. The constitution of the United States, after having carved out the whole mass of jurisdiction which it gives to the federal judiciary, and enumerated its several objects, proceeds in the second clause of the second section of the third article to distribute that jurisdiction amongst the several courts. To the Supreme Court, it gives original jurisdiction in two classes of cases, to wit, "in all cases affecting ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls, and those in which a state shall be a party;" in all the other cases to which the judicial power of the United States extends, it gives the Supreme Court appellate jurisdiction. This court, in the case of Marbury v. Madison,<sup>1</sup> thus expresses itself in relation to this clause of the constitution: "If Congress remains at liberty to give this court appellate jurisdiction, where the constitution has declared their jurisdiction shall be original; and original jurisdiction, where the constitution has declared their jurisdiction shall be appellate, the distribution of jurisdiction made in the constitution, is form without substance." Again, the court says, "the plain import of 301* the words seems to be, that in one *class of cases, its jurisdiction is original, not appellate; in the other, it is appellate, not original;" and accordingly, in that case, which was an application for a mandamus to the then Secretary of State, to issue commissions to certain justices of the peace in the District of Columbia, the court, after distinctly admitting that the parties had a right, yet refused to grant the mandamus, upon the ground that it would be an exercise of original jurisdiction; that not being one of the cases, in which that kind of jurisdiction was given them by the constitution, it was not competent to Congress to give it.

It appears, then, from the constitution, that where a state is a party, this court has original jurisdiction; it appears from the opinion of this court just quoted, that it excludes appellate jurisdiction. But a state is a party to the present case; it is a judgment for a penalty inflicted for the violation of a public law; the prosecution commenced by a presentment of a grand jury, carried on by an information filed by the attorney for the commonwealth, and the judgment rendered in the name of the commonwealth; and the case has come before this court by a writ of error, which is surely appellate jurisdiction; if, then, when a state is a party, this court have original jurisdiction; if the grant of original, exclude appellate jurisdiction; if, as in this case, a state be a party; and if the jurisdiction now claimed is clearly appellate, then it follows, as an inevitable conclusion, that in this case this court cannot take jurisdiction in this way, if they could take it at all.

*3. My last proposition is, that con- [302 sidering the nature of this case, and that a state is a party, the judicial power of the United States does not extend to the case, and that, therefore, this court cannot take jurisdiction at all. This is a criminal case, both upon principle and authority. A crime is defined to be an act committed or omitted in violation of some public law commanding or forbidding it. The offense in this case is one of commission. A prosecution in the name of a state, by information, as this has been shown to be, to inflict a punishment upon this offense, is, therefore, a prosecution for a crime; in other words, a criminal case. Upon authority, too, penal actions are called in the books criminal actions. But if it be a criminal case, it is conceded, that the courts of the United States cannot take original jurisdiction over it, inasmuch as that right fully belongs to the courts of the state whose laws have been violated; and that jurisdiction having once rightfully attached, they have a right to proceed to judgment; but if they have no original jurisdiction, I have shown, in the discussion of the second point, that they cannot have appellate jurisdiction, and it consequently follows, that they cannot have jurisdiction at all.

I will now endeavor to show, from general principles, in connection with the fair construction of the third article of the constitution, that without reference to the particular character of the case, whether as criminal or civil, the judicial power of the United States does not extend to it, on account of the character of one of the parties: in other words, *because [303 one of the parties is a state. It is an axiom in politics, that a sovereign and independent state is not liable to the suit of any individual, nor amenable to any judicial power, without its own consent. All the states of this Union were sovereign and independent, before they became parties to the federal compact; hence, I infer, that the judicial power of the United States would not have extended to the states, if it had not been so extended to them, eo nomine, upon the face of the constitution. But if it can reach them only because it is expressly given in relation to them, then it can only reach them to the extent to which it is given. By the original text of the constitution, the judicial power of the Union was extended to the following cases, in which states were parties, to wit, to controversies between two or more states, between a state and citizens of another state, and between a state and foreign states, citizens and subjects. The case of a contest between a state and one of its own citizens, is not included in this enumeration; and, consequently, if the principle which I have advanced be a sound one, the judicial power of the United States does not extend to it; but the uniform decision of this court has been, that if a party claim to be a citizen of another state, it must appear upon the record. As that does not appear upon the record in this case, I am authorized to say, that the plaintiffs in error are citizens of Virginia; then it is the simple case, of a contest between a state and one of its own citizens, which does not fall within the pale of federal judicial power.

304* It is said, however, that the judicial power is declared, by the constitution, to extend to all cases in law or equity, arising under this constitution, the laws of the United States, and treaties made, &c.; and that by reason of the expression "all cases," where the question is once mentioned in the constitution, the federal judicial power attaches upon the case on account of the subject-matter, without reference to the parties. Notwithstanding the latitude of this expression, it will be seen upon inquiry, that in the nature of things, there must be some limitation imposed upon this provision, which the gentlemen seem to consider unlimited. In the first place there are questions arising, or which might arise under the constitution, which the forms of the constitution do not submit to judicial cognizance. Suppose, for example a state were to grant a title of nobility, how could that be brought before a judicial tribunal, so as to render any effectual judgment? If it were an office of profit, it might, perhaps, be said, an information in the nature of a quo warranto would lie; but I ask whether that would lie, in the case which I have stated, or whether an effectual judgment could be rendered? It is a title, a name which would still remain, after your judgment had denounced it as unconstitutional. Where a quo warranto lies, in relation to an office, the judgment of ouster is followed by practical and effectual consequences. Again, suppose a state should keep troops or ships of war, in time of peace, or should engage in war, when neither actually invaded, nor in imminent danger. Here would 305* be alarming violations of the constitution, assailing too directly the federal powers; it would be a most serious question arising under the constitution, and yet clearly such a case as this does not belong to the judicial tribunal.

If it be said that the opposite counsel mean all cases in their nature of a judicial character, still I shall be able to show that broad as this expression is, it does not reach all these. It will be remembered by the court, that the words are, not all questions, but all cases. Although, therefore, a question may arise, yet before there can be a case, there must be parties over whom the court can take jurisdiction; and if there be no such parties, the court cannot act upon the subject, though the question may arise, though it may be clearly of a judicial nature, and though there may be the clearest violation of the constitution. By the 11th article of the amendments to the constitution, it is declared, that "the judicial power of the United States shall not be construed to extend to any suit in law or equity, commenced or prosecuted against one of the United States, by citizens of another state, or by citizens or subjects of any foreign state." Now, suppose that a state should, without the consent of Congress, lay a duty on tonnage, which should be paid by a citizen of another state; suppose, too, that a state should cause the lands of a British subject to be escheated, contrary to the ninth article of the treaty of 1794, upon the ground of alienage; or debts due to a British subject from individuals of the United States, or money or shares belonging to him, in the public funds or banks, to be confiscated, contrary to the *tenth article of the same treaty, and [306 deposit the proceeds in the public chest. It will be agreed on all hands, that the first is a palpable violation of the federal constitution, and the two others as palpable violations of the solemn stipulations of a treaty; and that, therefore, the first presents a question arising under the constitution, and the others one arising under a treaty; yet, will any man contend that the citizen of another state, in the first case, or the subject of the foreign state, in the others, could bring the offending state before the federal court, for the purpose of redressing their several wrongs? It will not be pretended; and why not? For the reason which I have given—that one of the parties in the cases supposed being a state, and the amendment referred to having declared, that a state should not be amenable to the suit of a citizen of another state, or the subject of a foreign state; although the questions have arisen, the cases have not; that is, the court cannot take judicial cognizance of the questions, because it cannot bring one of the parties interested in litigating it before them. Let us now suppose, that a state should collect a tonnage duty from one of its own citizens, could that citizen bring his own state before a federal court? The words of the 11th amendment apply to the case of a citizen of another state, or the citizen or subject of a foreign state; but the reason is, that it was only to them that the privilege of being parties in a controversy with a state, had been extended in the text of the constitution. It was only from them, therefore, that it was necessary to take away that privilege; *but, when from [307 those to whom a privilege had been given, that privilege had been taken away, they surely then occupy the same ground with those to whom it had never been given. When I speak here of the right of these persons under the constitution of suing a state, I speak of the interpretation of this court, particularly in the case of Chisholm's Ex'rs v. Georgia, in which the court decided, that a state might be made a party defendant. It was that decision which produced the 11th amendment. If I am right in the idea, that since that amendment, no matter what the character of the question, this court could not take jurisdiction in favor of the citizen of another state, or subject of a foreign state, against a state as defendant, it is equally true, that without the aid of that amendment, it never could take jurisdiction in favor of a citizen against his own state; because that is not one of the cases in which the federal judicial power extends to states, and because in this case, as in the others, although a question has arisen under the constitution, &c., a case has not arisen, inasmuch as you cannot bring one of the parties before you. That the constitution never contemplated giving jurisdiction to the federal courts in cases between a state and its own citizens, will appear manifestly, from the only reason assigned for giving it in favor of the citizens of other states, or foreign citizens. That reason was an insufficient one, even for the purpose for which it was assigned; it being, that as against foreigners and the citizens of other states, state courts might not be impartial where their states 308*) were parties; but such as it is, it *never could apply as between a state and its own citizens, whom they were under every moral and political obligation to protect, and towards whom, therefore, there could be no apprehension of a want of impartiality.

Upon a full view of this aspect of the subject, the fair construction of the constitution will be found to be this—that in carving out the general mass of jurisdiction, it had reference only to the natural and habitual parties to controversies, who are either natural persons, or corporations, short of political societies, not to states; that in relation to these, they could not have been made parties at all, but by express provision, and that, therefore, the extent to which they can be so made, is limited by the extent of that provision. It will be conceded, that the United States cannot be sued; and why? Because it is incompatible with their sovereignty. The states, before the adoption of the federal constitution, were also sovereign; and the same principle applies, unless it can be shown that they have surrendered this attribute of sovereignty; which I have endeavored to show they have not.

Upon my construction, there is consistency throughout the constitution. According to it, a state can never be subjected, at the suit of any individual, to any judicial tribunal, without its own consent; for it can never be made a party defendant in any case, or by any party, except in the cases between it and another state, or a foreign state. If it be a party plaintiff, I have already endeavored to prove that 309*) this *court could never take appellate, but only original jurisdiction, and that therefore as between a state and any individual, that state never could be placed in the attitude of a defendant. This idea is further sustained by reference to the history of the country. From that we learn, that the great and radical defect in the first confederacy was, that its powers operated upon political societies or states, not upon individuals. The characteristic difference between that and the present government is, that the latter operates upon the citizens. Take, for example, the power of taxation, which addresses itself directly to the people of the United States in the shape of an individual demand, instead of a requisition upon the states, for their respective quotas.

It has been said, that if this doctrine prevail, the federal government will be prostrated at the feet of the states, and that the various limitations and prohibitions imposed upon the states by the constitution, will be a dead letter, upon the face of that instrument, for the want of some power to enforce them. Let it be remembered that the several state legislatures and judiciaries are all bound, by the solemn obligation of an oath, to support the federal constitution; that to suppose a state legislature capable of wilfully legislating in violation of that constitution, if it is to suppose that it is so lost to the moral sense as to be guilty of perjury; a supposition which, thank God, the character of your people forbids us to make, nor can it be realized, until we shall have reached a maturity of corruption, from which I trust we are separated by a long tract of future *time. But if the legislatures [310 could be supposed to be so blind to the sacred dictates of conscience and of duty, as to pass such a law, we have another safeguard in the character of the state judiciaries. Before effect could be given to it, it must be supposed that the sanctity of the judicial ermine was also polluted. To him, who can for a moment entertain this unjust and injurious apprehension, I have nothing to say, but to ask him to look at the talents, the virtues, and integrity, which adorn and illustrate the benches of our state courts; and I will add, that according to the doctrine maintained by this court, in the case of Martin, v. Hunter<sup>1</sup> the judgments of the state courts, in questions arising under the constitution, between individuals, would be subject to the appellate jurisdiction of this court.<sup>2</sup> But if the states are under limitations by the constitution, so also is the federal government. If the state legislatures may be supposed possibly capable of violating that instrument, and the state judiciaries disposed to sustain *them in that violation, it may [311 as well be supposed that the federal legislature may be thus disposed, and the federal judiciary prepared to sustain them.

Whenever the states shall be determined to destroy the federal government, they will not find it necessary to act, and to act in violation of the constitution. They can quietly and effectually accomplish the purpose by not acting. Upon the state legislatures it depends to appoint the senators and Presidential electors, or to provide for their election. Let them merely not act in these particulars; the executive department, and part of the legislative, ceases to exist, and the federal government thus perishes by a sin of omission, not of commission. But I will endeavor in another way to show, that whenever the states shall have reached that point, either of corruption, or hostility, to the federal government, which they must arrive at before any of the extreme supposed violations of the constitution could occur, the jurisdiction now claimed for this court would be utterly inadequate as a remedy. Let us suppose one of the most glaring violations of the constitution: a bill of attainder or ex post facto law, for example, passed by a state; and that the state judiciary proceeds to conviction of the party prosecuted. Let us suppose that this court, claiming an appellate jurisdiction, forbids the execution of the party; but the state court orders its judgment to be executed, and it is executed, by putting to death the prisoner. His life cannot be recalled; that is beyond the reach of human power; can you prosecute the judges or the officer for murder? It will not be con-

2.—Mr. Barbour observed, in reply, that he wished to be distinctly understood, as not yielding his assent to the doctrine of Martin, v. Hunter. On the contrary, that he decidedly concurred with the Court of Appeals of Virginia, that the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court was in relation to inferior federal courts, not state courts. But, as that question had been solemnly decided otherwise by this court, with the argument of the Court of Appeals of Virginia before them, he had forborne to discuss it; he had referred to it, however, because, whilst this court acted upon the principle of that case, there was a controlling power, on the part of the federal, over the state judiciaries, in practical operation.

312*] tended. *Of what avail, then, the jurisdiction contended for, even for the purpose for which it is claimed? I answer, of none at all.

Mr. Smyth stated, that he should support the motion to dismiss the writ of error granted in this case, for two causes: (1) Because the constitution gives no jurisdiction to the court in the case. (2) Because the judiciary act gives no jurisdiction to the court in this case.

1. It is a question undecided, whether the appellate jurisdiction of this court, as declared by the constitution, does or does not extend to this case. If it was in all respects similar to the case of Martin v. Hunter,<sup>1</sup> adjudged in this court, I should contend, that the constitutional question of jurisdiction should not be regarded as settled. In that case, the counsel conceded the constitutional question, and no argument has been offered to this court in support of the jurisdiction of the state judiciary. One of the learned judges<sup>2</sup> of this court said, in that case, when speaking of the claim of power in this court to exercise appellate jurisdiction over the state tribunals, "this is a momentous question, and one on which I shall reserve myself uncommitted, for each particular case as it shall occur." And the court said, that "in several cases, which have been formerly adjudged in this court, the same point was argued by counsel, and expressly overruled." But the case now before the court is very different from 313*] that of **Martin v. Hunter*. This is a writ of error to revise a judgment given in a criminal prosecution, and in a case wherein a state was a party.

The government of the United States being one of enumerated powers, it is not a sufficient justification of the authority claimed, to say that there is nothing in the constitution that prohibits the federal judiciary to take cognizance, by way of appeal, of cases decided in the state courts. All the powers not granted are retained by the states; judicial power is granted; but it is federal judicial power that is granted, and not state judicial power. This grant neither impairs the authority of the state courts in suits remaining within their jurisdiction, nor makes them inferior courts of the United States. The government of the United States operates directly upon the people, and not at all upon the state governments, or the several branches thereof. The state governments are not subject to this government. The people are subject to both governments. This government is in no respect federal in its operation, although it is, in some respects, federal in its organization. Power has, indeed, been vested, by the constitution, in the state legislatures, to pass certain laws necessary to organize and continue the existence of the general government, and this power Congress may in part assume. They may prescribe the time, place, and manner, of holding elections of representatives; the time and manner of choosing senators by the state legislatures; and the time of choosing electors of a President. This 314*] power is expressly given by *the constitution; it was necessary Congress should possess it, for self-preservation; and, even in these cases, they have no power to prescribe to the state legislature a legislative act. This government cannot prescribe an executive act to the executive of a state, a legislative act to the legislature of a state, or (as I contend) a judicial act to the judiciary of a state.

If the constitution does not confer on the judiciary of the United States the appellate jurisdiction claimed, it is not enough that the act of Congress may purport to confer it. The framers of the judiciary act manifested a distrust of their authority; they seem to have foreseen that the state courts would refuse to give judgment according to the opinions of the Supreme Court. The case decided in the state court was not a case in law arising under the laws of the United States. It was a prosecution under a law of the state. Should a mandate issue in this case, and obedience be refused, this court will give judgment on a prosecution for violating state laws. If the case decided in the state court be regarded as a case in which a state was a party, the Supreme Court has, by the constitution, original, and not appellate jurisdiction. The appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court is only conferred in cases other than those whereof the Supreme Court has original jurisdiction. Who has original jurisdiction of those other cases? The inferior federal courts. Some of those other cases are those of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, of which, certainly, it was not intended *that the original jurisdiction should be [315 in the state courts.

If this writ of error be considered to be a suit in law, this court has no jurisdiction; for it is prosecuted against a state; and, by the 11th amendment to the constitution, no suit in law can be prosecuted by foreigners or citizens of another state against one of the United States. The amendment prohibits such suits commenced or prosecuted against a state. This seems expressly to extend to this writ of error, which, although not a suit in law commenced against a state, is a suit in law prosecuted against a state. This amendment, denying to foreigners and citizens of other states the right to prosecute a suit against a state, and being silent as to citizens of the same state, affords a proof that the federal courts never had jurisdiction of a suit between a citizen and the state whereof he is a citizen; for it cannot be presumed, that a right to prosecute a suit against a state would be taken from a foreigner or citizen of another state, and left to citizens of the same state. A release of all suits is a release of a writ of error;<sup>3</sup> and, consequently, a writ of error is "a suit in law," and cannot be prosecuted against a state.

The appellate jurisdiction conferred by the constitution on the Supreme Court, is merely authority to revise the decisions of inferior courts of the United States. Where the Supreme Court have not original jurisdiction, they have, by the constitution, appellate jurisdiction as to law and fact. Could it have been *intended to confer a power to re-ex- [316 amine decisions in the state courts; to try again the facts tried in those courts, and this even in criminal prosecutions? Surely not. Appellate jurisdiction signifies judicial power over the decisions of the inferior tribunals of the same sovereignty. Congress have power to "constitute" such tribunals; and it is made their duty to "ordain and establish" such. The framers of the constitution intended to create a new judiciary, to exercise the judicial power of a new government, unconnected with the judiciaries of the several states. Congress is not authorized to make the Supreme Court, or any other court of a state, an inferior court. They do not "constitute" such a court; they do not "ordain and establish it." The judges cannot be impeached before the senate of the United States; they receive no compensation for their services from the United States; and, consequently, cannot be required to render any services to the United States. The inferior courts, spoken of in the constitution, are manifestly to be held by federal judges. The judicial power to be exercised, is the judicial power of the United States; the errors to be corrected are those of that judicial power; and there can be no inferior courts exercising the judicial power of the United States, other than those constituted, ordained, and established by Congress.

The Supreme Court has appellate jurisdiction in cases to which the judicial power of the United States shall extend; but unless the original jurisdiction has extended to the case, the 317* appellate jurisdiction *can never reach it. The original jurisdiction alone is qualified to lay hold of it. If it shall be deemed proper to extend the judicial power to all the cases enumerated, the original jurisdiction must be thus extended. The court exercising appellate jurisdiction, must not only have jurisdiction over such a cause, and such parties, but it must have jurisdiction over the tribunal before which the cause has been depending. Judicial power, includes power to decide, and power to enforce the decision. This court has rather disclaimed power to enforce its mandate to the Supreme Court of a state. If you have not power to compel state tribunals to obey your decisions, you have no appellate jurisdiction in cases depending before them. Suppose it should be found necessary to direct a new trial in a cause removed from a state court, and that the state court refuses to obey your mandate; where shall the new trial be had? If you have appellate jurisdiction in a case decided by a state court, you must have power to make your decisions a part of the record of the state court. The constitution provides that full faith and credit shall be given in each state to the judicial proceedings of every other state. A plaintiff recovers in the courts of Virginia judgment for a sum of money; you reverse the judgment; but the state court does not record your decision; the plaintiff obtains a copy of the record of the judicial proceedings of the state, and presents them as evidence before the court of another state; he must recover, notwithstanding 318* standing your judgment, which *has not been made a part of that record, to which full faith and credit is to be given.

To give jurisdiction over the state courts, it is not sufficient that the constitution has said that the Supreme Court shall have appellate jurisdiction; for that will be understood to signify jurisdiction over inferior federal courts. To confer the jurisdiction claimed, the constitution should have said, that the judicial power of the United States shall have appellate jurisdiction over the judicial power of the several states. If it had been intended to give appellate jurisdiction over the state courts, the proper expressions would have been used. There is not a word in the constitution that goes to set up the federal judiciary above the state judiciary. The state judiciary is not once named. The subjects spoken of are the judicial power of the United States; the supreme and inferior courts of the United States; and the original and appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court. Appellate jurisdiction is not granted to the judicial power of the United States. It is granted to the Supreme Court of the United States. Federal judicial power is authorized to correct the errors of federal judicial power. I contend, that in no case can the federal courts revise the decisions of the state courts; no such power is expressly given by the constitution; and can it be believed that it was meant that the greatest, the most consolidating of all the powers of this government, should pass by an unnecessary implication? The states have granted to the United States power to pronounce their own judgment in certain cases; but they have not *granted the state [319 courts to the federal government; nor power to revise state decisions.

The power of the House of Lords to hear appeals from the highest court in Scotland, has been mentioned as a precedent for the exercise of such a power as is claimed for this court; but the cases are by no means similar. Scotland is consolidated with England under the same executive and legislature; and, therefore, ought to be subject, in the last resort, to the same judicial tribunal. If the states had no executive except the President, and no legislature except Congress, the cases would have some resemblance.

If you correct the errors of the courts of Virginia, you either make them courts of the United States, or you make the Supreme Court of the United States a part of the judiciary of Virginia. The United States can only pronounce the judgment of the United States. Virginia alone can pronounce the judgment of Virginia. Consequently, none but a Virginia court can correct the errors of a Virginia court.

There is nothing in the constitution that indicates a design to make the state judiciaries subordinate to the judiciary of the United States. The argument that Congress must establish a supreme court, and might have omitted to establish inferior courts, thereby depriving the Supreme Court of its appellate jurisdiction, unless it should be exercised over the state courts, seems to be without foundation. The judicial power of the United States is vested in the Supreme Court, and inferior courts; the judges of *the inferior courts shall receive a compensation. The possibility of Congress omitting to perform a duty positively enjoined on them, cannot change the constitution, or affect the jurisdiction of the state courts.

The federal judiciary and state judiciaries possess concurrent power in certain cases; but no authority is conferred on the one to reverse the decisions of the other. The state courts retain a concurrent authority in cases wherein they had jurisdiction previous to the adoption of the constitution, unless it is taken away by the operation of that instrument. I say a concurrent authority, not a subordinate authority. The power of the judiciary of the United States is either exclusive or concurrent, but not paramount power. And where it is concurrent only, then, whichever judiciary gets possession of the case, should proceed to final judgment, from which there should be no appeal. If it shall be established that this court has appellate jurisdiction over the state courts in all cases enumerated in the third article of the constitution, a complete consolidation of the states, so far as respects judicial power, is produced; and it is presumed that it was not the intention of the people to consolidate the judicial systems of the states, with that of the United States. It has been said, that the courts of the United States can revise the proceedings of the executive and legislative authorities of the states, and, if they are found to be contrary to the constitution, may declare them to be of no legal validity; and that the exercise of the same right over judicial tribunals, is not a higher or more 321*] *dangerous act of sovereign power.<sup>1</sup> This conclusion seems to be erroneous. When the federal courts declare an act of a state legislature unconstitutional, or an act of the state executive unlawful, they exercise no higher authority than the state courts exercise, who will not only declare an act of the state legislature, but even an act of Congress, unconstitutional and void. This only proves that the federal and state judiciaries have equally authority to judge of the validity of the acts of the other branches of both governments, and has no tendency whatever to establish the claim set up by federal judicial power, of supremacy over state judicial power.

This writ of error brings up the judgment rendered in a state court, in a criminal prosecution. Every government must possess within itself, and independently, the power to punish offenses against its laws. It would degrade the state governments, and devalue them of every pretension to sovereignty, to determine that they cannot punish offenses without their decisions being liable to a re-examination, both as to law and fact (if Congress please), before the Supreme Court of the United States. The claim set up would make the states dependent, for the execution of their criminal codes, upon the federal judiciary. The cases "in which a state shall be a party," of which the Supreme Court may take cognizance, are civil controversies. This seems obvious; because, to the Supreme Court is granted original jurisdiction of 322*] them. And it will not be contended *that the Supreme Court shall have original jurisdiction of prosecutions carried on by a state, against those who violate its laws. If "cases in law and equity, arising under the laws of the United States," comprehend criminal prosecutions in the state courts, then every prosecution against a citizen of the state, in which he may claim some exemption under an act of Congress or a treaty, however unfounded the claim, may be re-examined, both as to law and fact (if Congress please), in the Supreme Court. And if "controversies" include such prosecutions, then every prosecution against an alien, or the citizen of another state, may be so re-examined, whether he claim such exemption or not. Can this court bring up a capital case, wherein some exemption under a federal law is claimed by a prisoner in a state court? Would an appeal lie (should Congress so direct) from a jury? It would not, even if the trial was had in a federal court; for the accused has a right to a trial by a jury in the state and district wherein the crime shall be charged to have been committed. In all cases within the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court, that jurisdiction may extend to the law and the fact. But such jurisdiction, as to the fact, cannot extend to criminal cases; consequently, it was not intended that the appellate jurisdiction should extend to criminal cases; and, therefore, the Supreme Court have no appellate jurisdiction in criminal cases. Can, then, the court take jurisdiction in this case, which was a criminal prosecution, founded on the presentment of a grand jury? Surely they cannot. This case was not a qui tam action, which is regarded as a civil [*323 suit.<sup>2</sup> It was, both in form and substance, a criminal prosecution. And it has been declared by a judge of this court, that "the courts of the United States are vested with no power to scrutinize into the proceedings of the state courts, in criminal cases."<sup>3</sup>

That which is fixed by the constitution, Congress have no power to change. The jurisdiction of the state courts is fixed by the constitution. It is not a subject for congressional legislation. The people of Virginia, in adopting the constitution of the United States, had power to diminish the jurisdiction of the state judiciary; but Congress have no power over it; they can neither diminish nor extend it; they can neither take from the state tribunals one cause, or give them one to decide. As they cannot impose on the state courts any duties, so neither can they take from them any powers. Congress can neither add to or diminish the legislative power, the executive power, or the judicial power of a state, as fixed by the constitution. Congress may pass all laws necessary and proper to execute that power which is vested by the constitution in the judiciary of the United States; but this does not sanction a violation of the authority of the state courts. None can enlarge or abridge the jurisdiction of the judiciary of Virginia, except the people of Virginia, or the legislature of that state. As was the jurisdiction of the state judiciary on the 4th day of March, 1789, so it stands at this day, unless altered by the *state. If on that [*324 day the states retained jurisdiction of the most of the cases enumerated in the third article of the constitution, that jurisdiction must have been left to them by the constitution, and cannot be taken from them by Congress. The power either of a state legislature or a state judiciary, cannot depend on the use of, or neglect to use, a power, by Congress. Such state power is fixed by the constitution; the same to day as to-morrow, however Congress may legislate.

The judicial power of the United States is conferred by the constitution, and Congress cannot add to that power. Congress may distribute the federal judicial power among the

1.—1 Wheat. Rep. 344.

Wheat. 6.

2.—Cowp. 382.

3.—1 Wheat. Rep. 377.

federal courts, so far as the distribution has not been made by the constitution. If the constitution does not confer on this court, or on the federal judiciary, the power sought to be exercised, it is in vain that the act of Congress purports to confer it. And where the constitution confers original jurisdiction (as in cases where a state is a party), Congress cannot change it into appellate jurisdiction. The extent of the judicial power of the United States being fixed by the constitution, it cannot be made exclusive or concurrent, at the will of Congress. They cannot decide whether it is exclusive of the state courts or not; for that is a judicial question, arising under the constitution. If the judicial power of the United States is exclusive, Congress cannot communicate a part of it to the state courts, giving to the federal courts appellate jurisdiction over them. If by the constitution the state judiciary has concurrent 325*] jurisdiction, *Congress cannot grant to the federal courts an appellate jurisdiction over the exercise of such concurrent power. The state judiciary cannot have independent or subordinate power, at the will and pleasure of Congress.

The state judiciary have concurrent jurisdiction, by the constitution, over all the cases enumerated in the third article of the constitution, except, 1. Prosecutions for violating federal laws; 2. Cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction; and, 3. Cases affecting ambassadors, other public ministers, and consuls. No government can execute the criminal laws of another government. The states have parted with exterior sovereignty. As they cannot make treaties, perhaps they have not jurisdiction in the case of ministers sent to the federal government; as they cannot make war and peace, regulate commerce, define and punish piracies and offenses on the high seas, and against the law of nations, or make rules concerning captures on the water, perhaps they have no admiralty jurisdiction. The jurisdiction of the state courts over civil causes, arising under the constitution, laws, and treaties, seems to me to be unquestionable. The state judges are sworn to support the constitution, which declares them bound by the constitution, laws, and treaties. This was useless, unless they have jurisdiction of causes arising under the constitution, laws, and treaties, which are equally supreme law to the state courts as to the federal courts. The state judges are bound by oath to obey the constitutional acts of Congress; but they are not so 326*] bound to obey the decisions of *the federal courts; the constitution and laws of the United States are supreme; but the several branches of the government of the United States have no supremacy over the corresponding branches of the state governments.

The jurisdiction of the state courts is admitted by Congress; in the judiciary act; for, by an odious provision therein, which does not seem to be impartial, the decision of the state court, if given in favor of him who claims under federal law, is final and conclusive. Thus, the state courts have acknowledged jurisdiction; and if that jurisdiction is constitutional, Congress cannot control it.

Congress cannot authorize the Supreme Court to exercise appellate jurisdiction over the decisions of the state courts, unless they have legislative power over those courts. Can Congress give an appeal from a federal district court to a state court of appeal? I presume it will be admitted that they cannot. And why can they not? Because they have no power over the state court. And if they cannot give an appeal to that court, they cannot give an appeal from that court.

The constitution provides, that the judicial power of the United States shall "extend to" certain enumerated cases. These words signify plainly, that the federal courts shall have jurisdiction in those cases; but this does not imply exclusive jurisdiction, except in those cases where the jurisdiction of the state courts would be contrary to the necessary effect of the provisions of the constitution. Civil *suits, [*327 arising under the laws of the United States, may be brought and finally determined in the courts of foreign nations; and, consequently, may be brought and finally determined in the state courts.

The judiciary of every government must judge of its own jurisdiction. The federal judiciary and the state judiciary may each determine that it has, or that it has not, jurisdiction of the case brought before it; but neither can withdraw a case from the jurisdiction of the other. The question, whether a state court has jurisdiction or not, is a judicial question, to be settled by the state judiciary, and not by an act of Congress, nor by the judgment of the Supreme Court of the United States. Shall the states be denied the power of judging of their own laws? As their legislation is subject to no negative, so their judgment is subject to no appeal. Sovereignty consists essentially in the power to legislate, judge of, and execute laws. The states are as properly sovereign now as they were under the confederacy; and we have their united declaration that they then, individually, retained their sovereignty, freedom, and independence. The constitution recognizes the sovereignty of the states, for it admits that treason may be committed against them. They would not be entitled to the appellation of "states" if they were not sovereign.

Although the state courts should maintain a concurrent jurisdiction with the federal courts, yet foreigners would have, what before the adoption of the constitution they had not, a choice of tribunals, before which to bring their actions; and the state *judges are now [*328 bound by treaties as supreme law. If an alien plaintiff sues in the state courts, he ought to be bound by their decision; and if an alien is sued in a state court, he ought to be bound by the decision of the state in which he resides or sojourns, which protects him, to which he owes a temporary allegiance, and to whose laws he should yield obedience. The people could not have intended to give to strangers a double chance to recover, while citizens should be held bound by the first decision; that the citizen should be bound by the judgment of the state alone, while the stranger should not be bound but by the judgment of the state, and also of the United States. A statute contrary to reason, is void. An act of Congress which should violate the principles of natural justice, should also be deemed void. It is worthy of consideration, whether this clause in the judiciary act, which grants an appeal to one party, and denies it to the other, is not void, as being partial and unjust. If, in any case brought before them, the state courts shall not have jurisdiction, the defendant may plead to the jurisdiction, and the Supreme Court of the state will finally decide the point. If this is not a sufficient security for justice, as I apprehend it is, an amendment to the constitution may provide another remedy. If the defendant submits to the jurisdiction of the state court, and takes a chance of a fair trial, it is reasonable that he should be bound by the result.

As I deny to this court authority to remove, by writ of error, a cause from a state court, so 329* I likewise deny the authority of this court to remove, before judgment, from a state court, a suit brought therein. It will be equally an invasion of the jurisdiction of the state court, although less offensive in form, than a removal after judgment has been rendered. Congress can neither regulate the state courts, nor touch them by regulation.

Let the Supreme Court declare (for it is a judicial question) what cases are within the exclusive jurisdiction of the federal courts, by the constitution; and let Congress pass the necessary and proper laws for carrying that power into effect. Although I do not admit that the state courts would be absolutely bound by such a declaration, yet I have no doubt that the state courts would acquiesce. It is not for jurisdiction over certain cases that the state courts contend. It is for independence in the exercise of the jurisdiction that is left to them by the constitution.

2. Does the 25th section of the judiciary act comprehend this case, so that the court may take jurisdiction thereof?

In this case the construction of a statute of the United States is said to have been drawn in question, and the decision in the state court was against the exemption claimed by the defendant in that court. This court has no jurisdiction, if it shall appear that the defendant really had no exemption to set up in the state court, under a statute of the United States. If the act of Congress has no application, no bearing 330* on the case, the court has no jurisdiction.<sup>1</sup> The parties cannot, by making an act of Congress, which does not affect the cause, a part of the record, give this court jurisdiction.

This court have said, that "the sovereignty of a state in the exercise of its legislation, is not to be impaired, unless it be clear that it has transcended its legitimate authority; nor ought any power to be sought, much less to be adjudged, in favor of the United States, unless it be clearly within the reach of their constitutional charter."<sup>2</sup> This court have also said, that "the sovereign powers vested in the state governments by their respective constitutions, remained unaltered and unimpaired, except so far as they were granted to the government of the United States."<sup>3</sup> The state legislatures retain the powers not granted, and not repugnant to the exercise of the powers granted to Congress; and it is not denied, that the legislature of Virginia possessed, previous to the passage of the act of Congress for incorporating the city of Washington, authority to prohibit the sale of lottery tickets in Virginia. That legislature still possesses the power, unless the exercise thereof obstructs some means adopted by Congress for executing their delegated powers.

Actions are lawful or criminal, as the laws of the land determine. Whether an action done in Virginia is lawful or criminal, depends on the laws of that state, unless the action [*331] has been authorized or prohibited by Congress in carrying into execution some power granted to them, or the power of some department or officer of the government. The state governments are charged with the police of the states. They, considering certain acts as having a demoralizing tendency, have prohibited them. Shall Congress authorize those very acts to be done within the body of a state?

So entirely is the police of a state to be regulated by its own laws, that if Congress taxed licenses to sell lottery tickets, the payment of the tax would not confer on him who paid it, any authority to sell tickets contrary to the laws of a state. Congress imposed a tax on licenses to sell spirituous liquors by retail; but that did not prevent the state governments from regarding tippling-houses as nuisances, and punishing those retailers of spirits who were not licensed tavern-keepers. The license is grantable by the state; when granted, the federal government may tax it; but they have no power to grant it. The police belongs to the state government; and the federal government cannot, by the power of taxation, interfere with the police, so as to legalize any act which a state prohibits.

It is said that a lottery ticket owes its value to its salable quality. It is true that the salability of the ticket by the managers is essential to make the lottery of value to the corporation. But, those sales may be made in Washington. And, if they cannot, must the constitution yield to a lottery? The proprietor of property has not a right everywhere to dispose of it [*332] as he pleases. A man may own poison, but he must not sell it as a medicine. He may own money; but he may not, in Virginia, part with it at public gaming. He may come to Washington and purchase a lottery ticket; but if he takes it to Virginia he must not sell it there. A lottery ticket is a chose in action, and not assignable by the common law. The state laws determine whether bonds, bills, notes, &c., are assignable or not. Spirituous liquors are property; but they cannot be sold by retail, without the license of the state government.

The act of Congress under which this lottery has been authorized, is not an act passed in the execution of any of those specific powers which Congress may exercise over the states. The acts of Congress must be passed in pursuance of the constitution, or they are void. If they have passed a statute authorizing an act to be done in a state which they had no power to authorize in a state, their statute is void. The acts of Congress, to be supreme law in a state, must be passed in execution of some of the powers delegated to Congress, or to some department or officer of the government. Congress may pass all laws necessary and proper to carry a given power into effect; but they must have a given power. Now, what is the given power for the execution of which the sale of lottery tickets in the states is an appropriate means? It is sufficient to show that the act passed is a means of carrying into execution some delegated power. The degree of its necessity or propriety will not be questioned by this court; but it must 333*] obviously tend to the execution or sanction of some enumerated power. If it shall appear on the face of the act, that it is not passed for the purpose of carrying into effect an enumerated power, and that it is passed for some other purpose, the act would not be constitutional.

As to the object being a national one for which the money is raised by the lottery in question, the nation has no particular interest in anything in the city of Washington, except the public property and buildings belonging to the United States. The improvements to be made in the city by the proceeds of this lottery, are not national buildings for the accommodation of the federal government; they are corporation buildings for the accommodation of the city, the charge of which is to be borne out of the revenues of the city. But, it is not admitted, that if the money was to be applied to building of the capitol, that Congress would have power, for that purpose, to authorize the sale of lottery tickets in a state, contrary to state laws.

The nation is interested in the prosperity of every city within the limits of the Union. All may be made to contribute to the public treasury—the city of Washington as well as others. If these improvements in the city of Washington are such as the United States should pay for, let the money be advanced from the treasury, and raised by taxes or by loans in a constitutional manner, and let the taxes imposed on the city of Washington, for the purpose of making these improvements, be declared unconstitutional. They doubtless are so if the people of Washington alone are taxed for purposes truly 334*] national. *This measure is not adopted to aid the revenue of the United States. It is adopted for the purpose of aiding the revenue of the city of Washington; for effecting objects which the revenue of the city should effect, but which the ordinary revenue is unequal to. It is to raise an extraordinary revenue for the city of Washington. Virginia, in which state it has been attempted to raise a part of this extraordinary revenue, has no more interest in the penitentiaries and city halls of Washington than in those of Baltimore.

Our opponents must maintain that this is an act of Congress authorizing the sale of lottery tickets in Virginia. For if it is not, the question is at an end. I call upon them to show a power granted to Congress, which the sale of lottery tickets in a state is an appropriate means of executing. Suppose that Congress had passed an act expressly authorizing P. & M. Cohen to vend lottery tickets in Virginia, for the purpose of raising a fund to diminish the taxes laid by the corporation of Washington on the inhabitants, for their own benefit; would such an act have been constitutional? Which of the enumerated powers of Congress would such an act have been an appropriate means of carrying into effect? Suppose that Congress had considered lotteries as pernicious gambling; could they have prohibited the sale of lottery tickets in the states? It will be admitted that they could not. And if they cannot prohibit the sale of tickets in a state, it is contended that they cannot authorize such a sale. Let us suppose that Congress have passed an act authorizing the sale of lottery tickets in the states, for the purpose of raising money to build a city hall in the city of Washington. Is such an act within the constitutional powers of Congress? Is it a mode of laying and collecting taxes? Or is it a mode of borrowing money? And is it for the purpose of paying the debts or providing for the general welfare of the United States? Should it even be said that this lottery is a tax, or a mode of borrowing money, yet the tax is laid, or the money borrowed, not by and for the United States, but by the corporation for the city of Washington.

Congress have two kinds or grades of power: (1) Power to legislate over the states in certain enumerated cases. (2) Power to legislate over the ten miles square, and the sites of forts and arsenals, in all cases whatsoever. These powers, so very dissimilar, should be kept separate and distinct. The advocates of the corporation confound them. They pass the act of Congress by the power to legislate over the ten miles square, unlimited as to objects, but confined within the lines of the district, and they extend its operations over the states, by the power to legislate over them, limited as to objects, but co-extensive with the Union. The act incorporating the city of Washington was certainly not passed to carry into execution any power of Congress, other than the power to legislate over the District of Columbia. If the clause conferring power to legislate in all cases over the ten miles square, had been omitted, could Congress establish lotteries? Could an act establishing a lottery be ascribed to any of the specific powers, in the execution of which Congress may legislate over all the states?

If the act authorizing a lottery is justified by the powers which extend to the states, there is no occasion to rest it on the power to legislate in all cases over Columbia. And if it is not justified by the powers which extend to the states, it cannot be justified by that power which, being limited to the district, does not extend to the states. If the act of Congress has effect in Virginia, it is a law over the states, and must have been passed by a power to legislate over the states. Now, a law over the states cannot be passed by a power to legislate over Columbia. But it is the power to legislate over Columbia that has been exercised. Therefore, no law has been passed over the states. Consequently, no law has been passed having effect in the states. It is, then, by the power to legislate over the ten miles square that the authority to sell lottery tickets in the states must be defended.

The power to legislate over the ten miles square is strictly confined to its limits, and does not authorize the passage of a law for the sale of lottery tickets in the states.<sup>1</sup> When Congress legislate exclusively for Columbia, they are restrained to objects within the district. An act of Congress, passed by the authority to legislate over the district, cannot be the supreme law in a state; for if, by the power to legislate, in all cases whatsoever, over the district, Congress may legislate over the states, it 337* will necessarily *follow, that Congress may legislate over the states in all cases whatsoever.

The constitution gives to Congress power to exercise exclusive legislation over the ten miles square, in all cases whatsoever. In the case of Loughborough v. Blake, the court said, that "on the extent of these terms, according to the common understanding of mankind, there can be no difference of opinion." What is the opinion in which all mankind will unite as to the extent of those terms? Not an opinion that the laws passed in legislating over the district shall operate in the states. The opinion in which it is presumed that mankind generally will unite, is, that all acts of Congress, not contrary to reason or the restrictions of the constitution, passed in legislating over the district, shall operate exclusively within its limits, but not at all beyond them. The power given to Congress, is power to legislate exclusively in all cases over the district. What are the appropriate means of executing that power? To frame a code of laws having effect within the district only; to establish courts having jurisdiction within the district only, &c. But what are the powers claimed? Power to repeal the penal laws of a state; power to pass laws "that know no locality in the Union;" laws "that can encounter no geographical impediments;" laws "whose march is through the Union." I admit, that all the powers of Congress, except this of exclusive legislation in all cases, extend 338* throughout the Union; but this, by *the most express words, and from its nature, is local. Yet, in this case, by a power to legislate for a district ten miles square, Congress is made to assume a power to legislate over the whole Union; and because an act is authorized to be done in Columbia, over which Congress may legislate in all cases whatsoever, it is, therefore, to be a legal act when done in a state, the laws of such state notwithstanding.

The power given to Congress to legislate over the district in all cases whatsoever, is precisely of the same extent as if this had been the only power conferred on them. Now, had it been the only power conferred on Congress, could there have arisen any doubt about its extent? When Congress legislate for the District of Columbia, they are a local legislature. The authority to legislate over the district in all cases whatsoever, is as strictly limited as is that of the legislature of Delaware to legislate only over Delaware. The acts of the local legislature have no operation beyond the limits of the place for which they legislate.

If this clause confers on Congress any legislative power over the states, it must be of the kind granted. But the power granted is exclusive, and no one will contend, that an exclusive power to legislate over the states is conferred on Congress. The power given extends to all cases whatsoever, and no one will contend, that Congress have power to legislate over the states in all cases whatsoever. The grant is of an exclusive power in all cases over ten miles square. The claim set up is a claim of paramount power over the whole United States.

*Any single measure which Congress [*339 may adopt, must be justified by some single grant of power, or not at all. No combination of several powers can authorize Congress to adopt a single measure which they could not adopt either by one or another of those powers, combined with the power to pass necessary and proper laws for carrying such single power into effect.

There is no repugnancy between the acts of Virginia against selling lottery tickets within that state, and the power granted to Congress to legislate over the District of Columbia. There can be none; for the line of the district completely separates them. The act passed by Congress is confined to the district; the act of the state legislature is confined to the state. How can there be any repugnancy? A power to legislate over Virginia cannot come into collision with a power to legislate over the district, unless those to whom they are entrusted pass the limits of their jurisdiction. It is not alleged, that the legislature of Virginia have passed the limits of their jurisdiction. If Congress have authorized a lottery to be drawn within the city, the sale of tickets, and the drawing of the lottery are thereby legalized within the city. Congress have never said that lottery tickets may be sold in the states. Those tickets may be sold in any place where the local laws will admit. But that they should be sold in Virginia, where such a sale is unlawful, Congress have neither enacted, or had power to enact. It is said, that without a power to sell the tickets, the power to draw the lottery is *ineffectual. I answer, [*340 if a power to sell lottery tickets necessarily follows a power to draw lotteries, as the lotteries must be drawn in the city, so there the tickets must be sold. The authority to sell is the authority to draw; and as the principal authority (to draw) is confined to the city, so is the consequent authority (to sell). Can the corporation draw lotteries in the states? If not, where is their authority to sell where they have no authority to draw? If the seller of lottery tickets is the agent of the corporation, then they can clothe him with no legal authority to be executed in a state, contrary to the law of the state. The corporation must sell their tickets where they have authority, or where they are permitted to sell. If the seller was a purchaser of tickets, and desires to sell again, the city has no interest in that subsequent sale; and the purchaser must sell where he is permitted to sell. Why should the owners of these tickets have an exclusive privilege in Virginia, to sell their tickets, contrary to the laws of the land?

It has been, in effect, maintained, that Congress may not only themselves legislate over the Union, but that they may exercise this power by substitute. Power to legislate over a state must be derived from the people; and cannot be transferred. If the power to legislate over the city may be vested in the representatives of the people thereof, yet, surely, a power to legislate over the states cannot be transferred to the representatives of the people of the city. When Congress pass an act which 341*] shall have the *effect of law in the states, it must be passed in pursuance of power delegated to them by the people of the states. The constitution declares, that "all legislative power herein granted shall be vested in a Congress of the United States." This vested power cannot be transferred to a corporation. It must be exercised by Congress, and in the manner prescribed by the constitution. Legislative power is not, in its nature, transferable. The people do not consent to obey any laws except those passed by their representatives according to the constitution. They who legislate for the nation must represent the nation. The corporation of Washington cannot receive power to legislate over the people of the United States. To incorporate the people of the city of Washington with power to make by-laws for the government and police of the city, is no transfer of power. It is an authority to exercise an inherent power. There is in every body of people a natural inherent right to legislate for themselves; but small societies must have permission or authority, from the great societies, of which they form a part. Thus, Congress authorized the people of Missouri to form a constitution, and govern themselves. Is this a transfer of power? No, certainly; it is an authority to exercise the inherent power of the people in governing themselves. Congress may authorize the people of Washington, or the people of Arkansas, to govern themselves; but it was never heard, until this case arose, that a local corporation, authorized by Congress to legislate for themselves, could 342*] pass laws of *obligation throughout the Union; laws paramount in the states to the laws of the states.

It seems to have been considered by the advocates of the corporation, that what Congress authorizes to be done, that they do. This is not so. Congress authorized Missouri to form a constitution; but Congress did not therefore form the constitution of Missouri. The corporation of Washington were left free to act on the subject of lotteries. They were empowered to authorize the drawing of lotteries, and to pass the laws necessary and proper for carrying that power into effect. The law establishing the lottery in question, is the by-law of the corporation. The by-laws of the city of London are not acts of Parliament, or laws of the realm; neither have the by-laws of the city of Washington any force beyond the limits of the city.

Congress have not said that the lottery tickets should be sold in the states. They have not even said that there shall be a lottery. Congress empowered the corporation to pass the law, and the corporation passed it; the ordinance of the corporation establishing a lottery, is no more a part of the act of Congress than the territorial laws now passing in Arkansas will be parts of the acts of Congress. It is not an act of Congress under which these tickets have been sold in Virginia, contrary to the laws of that state; it is a by-law of the corporation of Washington that gave existence to this lottery. An act of Congress does not apply to the case; and therefore this court have no jurisdiction under the judiciary act.

343*] *The powers of the corporation of Washington are confined within the limits of the city. Being a corporation for government, all within the corporate limits are subject to them; but no others.<sup>1</sup> They cannot make a by-law affecting even their own members, beyond the corporate limits; they have no power to pass a law authorizing the sale of lottery tickets in Georgetown, much less have they the power to authorize the sale of them in a state, contrary to its laws. This by-law either extends beyond the limits of the city, or it does not. If it does, it is void; and if it does not, it can have no effect in Virginia. The by-laws of a corporation are to be subject to the laws of the land, even within their limits. The laws of the states are the laws of the land, within their limits, on subjects not committed to congress. To those laws all corporate laws are subject.<sup>2</sup> But there cannot be that kind of collision between by-laws of the corporation of Washington and state laws, as between the by-laws of the corporation of the city of London, and the laws of England. As the by-laws of London may come in collision with the laws of England, but cannot come in collision with the laws of Ireland and Scotland, in those countries; so the by-laws of the corporation of *Washington [344] may come in collision with the laws of the United States in the ten mile square; but can never come in collision with the laws of a state, for they cannot have operation in a state.

The court will maintain the powers of Congress as granted by the people, and for the purposes for which they were granted by the people; and will, if possible, to preserve harmony, prevent the clashing of federal and state powers. Let each operate within their respective spheres; and let each be confined to their assigned limits. We are all bound to support the constitution. How will that be best effected? Not by claiming and exercising unacknowledged power. The strength thus obtained will prove pernicious. The confidence of the people constitutes the real strength of this government. Nothing can so much endanger it as exciting the hostility of the state governments. With them it is to determine how long this government shall endure. I shall conclude by again reminding the court of a declaration of their own, that, "no power ought to be sought, much less adjudged, in favor of the United States, unless it be clearly within the reach of their constitutional charter."

Mr. D. B. Ogden, contra, (1) stated, that he should not argue the general question whether this court had an appellate jurisdiction, in any case, from the state courts, because it had been already solemnly adjudged by this court, in the case of Martin v. Hunter.<sup>3</sup>

*2. This is a case arising under the [345] constitution and laws of the Union, and therefore the jurisdiction of the federal courts extends to it by the express letter of the constitution; and the case of Martin v. Hunter has determined that this jurisdiction may be exercised by this court in an appellate form. But it is said, that the present case does not arise under the constitution and laws of the United States, because the legislative powers of Congress, as respects the District of Columbia, are limited and confined to that district. But, if the law be thus limited in its operation, how is this to be discovered but by examining the constitution? and how is this examination to be had but by taking jurisdiction of the case? In the whole argument, constant reference was had, and necessarily had, to the constitution, in order to decide the case between the parties, upon this question of jurisdiction; and yet it is said to be a case not arising under the constitution. It is also contended, that it is not an act of Congress, the validity of which is drawn in question in the present case; but an ordinance of the corporation of the city of Washington; and the maxim of delegatus non potest delegare, is referred to, in order to show that the corporation cannot exercise the legislative power of Congress. Is it meant by this to assert that Congress cannot authorize the corporation to make by-laws? Even the soundness of this position cannot be determined without examining the constitution and acts of Congress, and adjudging upon their interpretation. The whole District of Columbia, and all its subordinate municipal corporations, are the 346* creatures *of the constitution; and the acts of Congress, relative to it, must be determined by the constitution, and must be laws of the United States. Are not the extent of the powers vested in Congress, and the manner in which these powers are to be executed, necessarily, questions arising under the constitution, by which the powers are given? How can the question, whether this is a lottery authorized by an ordinance of the corporation, and not by a law of the United States, be decided, but by a reference to the laws of the Union, and the constitution under which they were enacted? The plaintiffs in error set up a right to sell lottery tickets in the state of Virginia, under the constitution and laws of the United States, and the state denies it. By whom is this question to be decided? It is a privilege or exemption, within the very words of the judiciary act, set up or claimed, by the party, under the constitution and laws of the Union. It is immaterial for the present purpose whether the claim be well or ill founded. The question is, whether the party setting up the claim, is to be turned out of court, without being heard upon the merits of his case. If you have not jurisdiction, you cannot hear him upon the merits. Upon this motion to quash the writ of error, you can only inquire into the jurisdiction, and cannot look into the merits; but you are asked to turn the party out of court for defect of jurisdiction, and without giving him an opportunity to show that by the laws and constitution of the Union, he is entitled to the privilege and exemption which he claims. It is no answer to say that 347* *any individual may allege that he has such a privilege, in order to remove his case from the state court to this; because no injury would ensue, as the case would be sent back with damages; and even if there might be some inconveniences, from improperly bringing causes here, they ought rather to be submitted to, than to hazard the possible violation of the constitutional rights of a citizen.

Wheat. 6.

3. It is no objection to the exercise of the judicial powers of this court, that the defendant in error is one of the states of the Union. Its authority extends, in terms, to all cases arising under the constitution, laws, and treaties of the United States; and if there be any implied exceptions, it is incumbent on the party setting up the exception to show it. In order to except the states, it is said that they are sovereign and independent societies, and therefore not subject to the jurisdiction of any human tribunal. But we deny, that since the establishment of the national constitution, there is any such thing as a sovereign state, independent of the Union. The people of the United States are the sole sovereign authority of this country. By them, and for them, the constitution was established. The people of the United States in general, and that of Virginia in particular, have taken away from the state governments certain authorities which they had before, so that they are no longer sovereign and independent in that sense which exempts them from all coercion by judicial tribunals. Every state is limited in its powers by the provision of the constitution; and whether a state passes those limits, is a question *which the people of the Union [*348 have not thought fit to trust to the state legislatures or judiciaries, but have conferred it exclusively on this court. The court would have the jurisdiction without the word state being mentioned in the constitution. The term "all cases," means all, without exception; and the states of the Union cannot be excepted, by implication, because they have ceased to be absolutely sovereign and independent. The constitution declares that every citizen of one state, shall have all the privileges of the citizens of every other state. Suppose Virginia were to declare the citizens of Maryland aliens, and proceed to escheat their lands by inquest of office: the party is without a remedy, unless he can look for protection to this court, which is the guardian of constitutional rights. Because the state, which is the wrong-doer, is a party to the suit, is that a reason why he should not have redress? By the original text of the constitution, there is no limitation in respect to the character of the parties, where the case arises under the constitution, laws, and treaties of the Union; and the amendment to the constitution respecting the suability of states, merely applies to the other class of cases, where it is the character of the parties, and not the nature of the controversy, which alone gives jurisdiction. The original clause giving jurisdiction on account of the character of the parties, as aliens, citizens of different states, &c., does not limit, but extends the judicial power of the Union. The amendment applies to that alone. It leaves a suit between a state and a citizen, arising under the constitution, laws, &c., *where it [*349 found it; and the states are still liable to be sued by a citizen, where the jurisdiction arises in this manner, and not merely out of the character of the parties. The jurisdiction in the present case arises out of the subject-matter of the controversy, and not out of the character of the parties; and, consequently, is not affected by the amendment.

But it is said, that admitting the court has jurisdiction where a state is a party, still that jurisdiction must be original, and not appellate; because the constitution declares, that in cases in which a state shall be party, the Supreme Court shall have original jurisdiction, and in all other cases, appellate jurisdiction. The answer is, that this provision was merely intended to prevent states from being sued in the inferior courts of the Union; that the Supreme Court is to have appellate jurisdiction in all cases arising under the constitution, laws, and treaties of the United States; that where, in such a case, a state sues in its own courts, it must be understood as renouncing its privilege or exemption, and to submit itself to the appellate power of this court; since, if the jurisdiction in this class of cases be concurrent, it cannot be exercised originally in the Supreme Court, wherever the state chooses to commence the suit in its own courts. Nor is there any hardship in this construction. The state cannot be sued in its own courts; but if it commences a suit there against a citizen, and a question arises in that suit under the constitution, laws, and treaties of the Union, there must be power in this court to revise the decision of the state 350* court, in order to *produce uniformity in the construction of the constitution, &c. So, if a consul sues in the Circuit Court, this court has appellate jurisdiction, although the consul could not be sued in the Circuit Court. And if the United States, who cannot be sued anywhere, think proper to sue in the District or Circuit Court, they are amenable to the appellate jurisdiction of this court. Even granting, therefore, that a state cannot be sued in any case; the state is not sued here: she has sued a citizen, in her own tribunals, who implores the protection of this high court to give him the benefit of the constitution and laws of the Union. The jurisdiction does not act on the state; it merely prevents the state from acting on a citizen, and depriving him of his constitutional and legal rights.

It is true, there are some cases where this court cannot take jurisdiction, though the constitution and laws of the Union are violated by a state. But wherever a case is fit for judicial cognizance, or wherever the state tribunals take cognizance of it, whether properly or not, the appellate power of this court may intervene, and protect the constitution and laws of the Union from violation. Doubtless, a state might grant titles of nobility, raise and support armies and navies, and commit many other attacks upon the constitution, which this court could not repel. But if these attacks were made by judicial means, or if judicial means were used to compel obedience to these illegal measures, the authority of this court could, and would, intervene. Nor can *this argument ap- *351 ply to a case which is entirely judicial in its very origin, and, therefore, steers clear of the supposed difficulty of vindicating the constitution and laws of the Union from violation in other cases which may be imagined.

Neither is this a criminal case. The offense in question is not made a misdemeanor by the law of Virginia. That law merely imposes a penalty, which may be recovered by action of debt, or information, or indictment. The present prosecution is a mere mode of recovering the penalty. But suppose it is a criminal case. The constitution declares, that the court shall have jurisdiction in all cases arising under it, or the laws and treaties of the Union; which includes criminal as well as civil cases; unless, indeed, Congress has refused jurisdiction over the former in the judiciary act, which we insist it has not.

Mr. Pinkney, on the same side, (1) argued, that there was no authority produced, or which could be produced, for the position on the other side, that this court could not, constitutionally, exercise an appellate jurisdiction over the judgments or decrees of the state courts, in cases arising under the constitution, laws, and treaties of the Union. The judiciary act of 1789, c. 20, contains a cotemporaneous construction of the constitution in this respect, of great weight, considering who were the authors of that law; and which has been since confirmed by the repeated decisions of this court, constantly exercising *the jurisdiction in *352 question.<sup>1</sup> This legislative and judicial exposition has been acquiesced in, since no attempt has ever been made to repeal the law upon the ground of its repugnancy to the constitution. Transiit in rem judicatam. But even before the constitution was adopted, and whilst it was submitted to public discussion, this interpretation was given to it by its friends, who were anxious to avoid every objection which could render it obnoxious to state jealousy. But they well knew that this interpretation was unavoidable, and the authors of the celebrated Letters of Publius or the Federalist, have stated it in explicit terms.<sup>2</sup>

2.—Here another question occurs—what relation would subsist between the national and the state courts in these instances of concurrent jurisdiction? I answer, that an appeal would certainly lie from the latter to the Supreme Court of the United States. The constitution in direct terms gives an appellate jurisdiction to the Supreme Court in all the enumerated cases of federal cognizance, in which it is not to have an original one; without a single expression to confine its operation to the inferior federal courts. The objects of appeal, not the tribunals from which it is to be made, are alone contemplated. From this circumstance, and from the reason of the thing, it ought to be construed to extend to the state tribunals. Either this must be the case or the local courts must be excluded from a concurrent jurisdiction in matters of national concern, else the judiciary authority of the Union may be eluded at the pleasure of every plaintiff or prosecutor. Neither of these consequences ought, without evident necessity, to be involved; the latter would be entirely inadmissible, as it would defeat some of the most important and avowed purposes of the proposed government, and would essentially embarrass its measures. Nor do I perceive any foundation for such a supposition. Agreeably to the remark already made, the national and state systems are to be regarded as one whole. The courts of the latter will of course be natural auxiliaries to the execution of the laws of the Union, and an appeal from them will as naturally lie to that tribunal which is destined to unite and assimilate the principles of national justice and the rules of national decisions. The evident aim of the plan of the convention is, that all the causes of the spec-

353*] *But it is said, that the jurisdiction of the state courts is concurrent with those of the Union, over that class of cases arising under the constitution, laws, and treaties of the United States. This, however, is not of absolute necessity, but at the discretion of Congress, who may restrain and modify this concurrent jurisdiction, or render it exclusive in the federal tribunals at their pleasure. The supremacy of the national constitution and laws, is a fundamental principle of the federal government, and would be entirely surrendered to state usurpation, if Congress *could not, at its option, invest the courts of the Union with exclusive jurisdiction over this class of cases, or give those courts an appellate jurisdiction over them from the decisions of the state tribunals. Every other branch of federal authority might as well be surrendered. To part with this, leaves the Union a mere league or confederacy of states entirely sovereign and independent. This particular portion of the judicial power of the Union is indispensably necessary to the existence of the Union. It is an axiom of political science, that the judicial power of every government must be commensurate with its legislative authority; it must be adequate to the protection, enforcement, and assertion of all the other powers of the government. In some cases this power must necessarily be directly exercised by the federal tribunals, as in enforcing the penal laws of the Union. But in other cases, it is merely a protecting power, and cannot, from the very nature of things, be exercised, in the first instance, by the courts of the Union. Such are suits between citizen and citizen on contract. Here the state courts must necessarily have original jurisdiction; but if the party defendant sets up a defense, founded (for example) upon an act of the state legislature supposed to impair the obligation of contracts, and the decision of the state court is in favor of the law thus set up, the judicial authority of the Union must be exerted over the cause, or that clause of the constitution which prohibits any state from making a law impairing the obligation of contracts is a dead letter. There is nothing in the constitution which prohibits the 355*] *exercise of such a controlling authority. On the contrary, it is expressly declared, that where the case arises under the constitution and laws of the Union, the judicial power of the Union shall extend to it. It is the case, then, and not the forum in which it arises, that is to determine whether the judicial authority of the Union shall be exercised over it. But there is a class of cases which must necessarily originate in the state tribunals, because it cannot be known at the time the suit is commenced, whether it will or will not involve any question arising under the constitution and laws of the Union. Over this class of cases, then, the courts of the Union must have appellate jurisdiction. The appellate power of this court is extended by the constitution to all cases within the judicial authority of the Union, and not included within the original jurisdiction of this court. Its appellate power, so far as respects the constitution, depends, then, on two questions only: is the case within the judicial power of the Union? and is it within the original cognizance of this court? The first question being answered affirmatively, and the second negatively, the appellate power under the constitution is completely established in any given case.

But the power of removing this class of causes, pendente lite, is also denied; and it is said that the authority to remove, before judgment, a suit brought in the state court, into the federal court, is repugnant to the constitution. In Martin v. Hunter, the argument was the other way, and it was insisted, that Congress ought to have given to this court the *power of evoking this [*356] description of causes from the state tribunals, the moment any question arose respecting the constitution and laws of the Union, in order to avoid the offensive exercise of an appellate jurisdiction over the state courts.<sup>1</sup> Quaecunque via data—it is immaterial; for the power of removal, if it be not unconstitutional, is an appellate power, and analogous to a writ of error. If it be unconstitutional, the necessity for the controlling power of a writ of error, is only the more manifest. Take away both, and the constitution, laws, and treaties of the Union lie at the mercy of the state judicatures.

Again. It is said, that the judges of the state courts take an oath to support the constitution of the Union, and the laws and treaties of the Union are their supreme law; and it is inferred that the constitution reposes implicit confidence in them, and there ought to be no revision of their judgments. But, it may be asked, if the constitution reposes this implicit confidence in the state tribunals, why does it authorize the establishment of federal courts, which, upon this supposition, would be wholly useless? And why are the members of the state legislatures and executives required to take the same oath? They are bound to support the constitution by the same solemn sanctions, and yet their acts may confessedly be set aside by the national judicatures, as being repugnant to that constitution. The actual constitution of this country is not a government of confidence; it is a scheme of government *conceived in the spirit of jealousy, [*357] and rendered adequate to all its own purposes, by its own means; and the judicial power of the Union is the principal means of giving effect to it. This it is which distinguishes it from the confederation. Experience has shown the necessity and wisdom of this provision. If the state courts may adjudicate conclusively for the Union, why may not the state legislatures legislate for it; and where is the utility of distinct and appropriate powers, if it cannot maintain them from violation? In Martin v. Hunter,<sup>2</sup> the court considered this argument fully, and thought it operated the other way.

fixed classes shall, for weighty public reasons, receive their original or final determination in the courts of the Union. To confine, therefore, the general expressions, giving appellate jurisdiction to the Supreme Court, to appeals from the subordinate federal courts, instead of allowing their extension to the state courts, would be to abridge the latitude of the terms, in subversion of the intent, contrary to every sound rule of interpretation." No. LXXXIII.

1.—1 Wheat. Rep. 319.

2.—1 Wheat. Rep. 349.

The care which the constitution takes to make the state courts respect it, and the laws and treaties made under it, proves that it was supposed that cases might come before them by original suit, which would involve the rights and interests of the Union, and lay a foundation for appeal or revision. This was anticipated, and the constitution endeavors to make the first decision correct, by the sanction of an oath. But it does not improvidently rely upon that alone. The judges of the inferior courts of the Union take the same oath, and lie under the same obligation; but they are not the less subject to the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court.

But it is asked, can Congress grant an appeal from the District or Circuit Court, to a state court? The question is answered in the negative, and it is thence inferred that they cannot [358*] grant an appeal *from a state to a federal court. This seems to imply that you can do nothing unless you can do its opposite. Such a proposition would repeal all the physical and moral laws of the universe. As well might it be asked, can Congress grant an appeal from the Supreme to the District Court? and because there is something absurd in the idea of an appeal from a superior to an inferior tribunal, it would be inferred that the opposite appeal could not be granted. But, until the relation of supreme and subordinate is destroyed, the state laws and judicatures must be considered as subordinate to those of the Union, in all cases within the scope of its powers and jurisdiction. Such was once the doctrine asserted by Virginia herself, and to which it is confidently believed she will revert in a moment of calmer reflection<sup>1</sup>.

*2. It is further contended on the [*359] other side, that this court has no jurisdiction of the present case, because the writ of error presents no question arising *under the [*360] constitution or laws of the United States. And to show this, it is said that the record speaks only of the validity of the act of Congress, *and nobody denies its validity, [*361] and therefore no question arises under an act of Congress. But the words of the judiciary act are pursued by this writ of error, as they always have been in other cases. It is the validity of the act of Congress, and the validity of the act of Virginia, as compared with it, which are drawn into question. The court below decided against the first, and in favor of the last,

1.—The learned counsel here read the following resolutions of the legislature of Virginia:

Extract from the journal of the Senate of the commonwealth of Virginia, begun and held at the capitol in the city of Richmond, the 4th day of December, 1809.

Friday, January 26, 1810. "Mr. Nelson reported from the committee to whom were committed the preamble and resolutions on the amendment proposed by the legislature of Pennsylvania, to the constitution of the United States, by the appointment of an impartial tribunal to decide disputes between the state and federal judiciary, that the committee had, according to order, taken the said preambles and resolutions under their consideration, and directed him to report them without any amendment. And on this question being put thereupon, the same were agreed to unanimously, by the House, as follows: The committee to whom was referred the communication of the Governor of Pennsylvania, covering certain resolutions of the legislature of that state, proposing an amendment to the constitution of the United States, by the appointment of an impartial tribunal to decide disputes between the state and federal judiciary, have had the same under their consideration, and are of opinion that a tribunal is already provided by the constitution of the United States, to wit: The Supreme Court, more eminently qualified from their habits and duties, from the mode of their selection, and from the tenure of their offices, to decide the disputes aforesaid, in an enlightened and impartial manner, than any other tribunal which could be created. The members of the Supreme Court are selected from those in the United States, who are most celebrated for virtue and legal learning, not at the will of a single individual, but by the concurrent wishes of the President and Senate of the United States; they will therefore have no local prejudices and partialities. The duties they have to perform lead them necessarily to the most enlarged and accurate acquaintance with the jurisdiction of the federal, and several state courts, together with the admirable symmetry of our government. The tenure of their offices enables them to pronounce the sound and correct opinions they may have formed, without fear, favor, or partiality. The amendment to the constitution proposed by Pennsylvania, seems to be founded upon the idea that the federal judiciary will, from a lust of power, enlarge their jurisdiction, to the total annihilation of the jurisdiction of the state courts; that they will exercise their will instead of the law and the constitution. This argument, if it proves anything, would operate more strongly against the tribunal proposed to be created, which promises so little, than against the Supreme Court, which, for the reasons given before, have everything connected with their appointment calculated to insure confidence. What security have we, were the proposed amendment adopted, that this tribunal would not substitute their will and their pleasure in place of the law? The judiciary are the weakest of the three departments of government, and least dangerous to the political rights of the constitution. They hold neither the purse nor the sword; and even to enforce their own judgments and decrees, must ultimately depend upon the executive arm. Should the federal judiciary, however, unmindful of their weakness, unmindful of the duty which they owe to themselves and their country, become corrupt and transcend the limits of their jurisdiction, would the proposed amendment oppose even a probable barrier to such an improbable state of things? The creation of a tribunal such as is proposed by Pennsylvania, so far as we are enabled to form an idea of it, from the description given in the resolutions of the legislature of that state, would, in the opinion of your committee, tend rather to invite, than prevent a collision between the federal and state courts. It might also become, in process of time, a serious and dangerous embarrassment to the operations of the general government.

Resolved, therefore, that the legislature of this state do disapprove of the amendment to the constitution of the United States proposed by the legislature of Pennsylvania.

Resolved, also, that his excellency the Governor, be, and is hereby requested to transmit forthwith, a copy of the foregoing preamble and resolutions to each of the senators and representatives of this state, in Congress, and to the executives of the several states in the Union, and request that the same be laid before the legislatures thereof.

Extract from the journal of the House of Delegates of the commonwealth of Virginia:

"Tuesday, January 23, 1810. The House, according to the order of the day, resolved itself into a committee of the whole house on the state of the commonwealth, and after some time spent therein, Mr. Speaker, resumed the chair, and Mr. Robert Stanard reported that the committee had, according to order, had under consideration the preamble and resolutions of the select committee to whom were referred that part of the Governor's communication which relates to the amendment proposed to the constitution of the United States, by the legislature of Pennsylvania, had gone through the same, and directed him to report them to the House without amendment; which he handed in at the clerk's table, and the question being put on agreeing to the said preamble and resolutions, they were agreed to by the House unanimously.

to the full extent of the case. The validity of the act of Congress, means the effect attributed to it by the defendant who sets it up as a defense against so much of the act of the state as inflicts a penalty upon him for doing what the act of Congress authorizes. The defendant relies upon the act of Congress, as creating an exception in favor of his case, out of the act of Virginia. He says it is valid, or available, or efficacious to create such an exception. That was the question which the record shows was before the court below; and the court decided that it was not so valid, or available, or efficacious. Whether it is so or not, is the question which the writ of error presents for inquiry; 362* and it is such a question as the appellate power of this court can deal with. But the question on this motion to dismiss the writ of error, is not whether the act of Congress is valid as against the act of Virginia; but whether that question is presented by the record, so that this court can determine it, after it has concluded to entertain the writ of error. It is the claim of a right, privilege, or exemption under the statute of the United States, which gives the jurisdiction.<sup>1</sup> The decision upon that claim, as it appears upon the record, is the exercise of the jurisdiction. That the claim to exemption appears upon the record cannot be denied in this case more than any other. The claim may even be an absurd one; but this court cannot be called upon, on a motion to dismiss the writ of error, to condemn it as such. All argument upon the sufficiency of the claim is premature, so long as it is, sub judice, whether the court can examine its sufficiency.

But it is said, that the question does not arise under any statute of the United States, but under a mere by-law of the city of Washington; and that the case involves nothing but that by-law; and it is said to be absurd to call a by-law of the city of Washington a law of the United States. It is immaterial whether it be so or not. The by-law is the execution of a power given by a law of the United States. The effect of the execution of that power, involves the effect of the law; and although the execution of the power is not a law [of the 363* United States, yet that which gives the power is. The question, therefore, is, not what is the mere effect of the execution of the power in the abstract, or unconnected with the law which gives it, but what is the effect of the power by force of the law which gives it; and that question compels you to mount up to the constitution itself.

The course of the inquiry will then be: (1) What has the party done? and what is the immediate authority under which he did it? (2) What is the nature and extent of that authority? what its qualities under the law which gave it, and the constitution under which that law was passed?

If an officer of the United States does any act for which a state court calls him to account, and he relies in his defense upon the authority, real or supposed, of a statute of Congress, his act is not a law of the United States; but his defense is referred to the effect and validity of a law of the United States, and that is again referred to the constitution, which is the paramount law. The last act done need not be a law of the United States. It is sufficient, if it is attempted to be justified, or its consequences maintained, under a law of the United States, which it is alleged gave to it a protecting power in the case before the court.

It is, however, asserted, that the constitution gives jurisdiction only in cases arising under it, or the laws, or treaties of the United States; and that this case does not arise under a law of the United States, because the act of Congress now in question is not a law of the United States. An act of the Congress, *in its [364 capacity of local sovereign of the District of Columbia, is said not to be a law of the United States. But whose law, then, is it? The United States in Congress assembled, are the local sovereigns of the district, and it is by them that this law is passed. Is it less a law of the United States, because it does not operate directly upon the Union at large? A statute is not a law of the United States on account of the subject on which it acts being limited or unlimited. It is a law of the United States, because it is passed by the legislative power of the United States. The legislative authority over the District of Columbia, is that of the Union. Its sphere is limited, but the power itself is even greater than the general federal power of the Union. It is the power of the people and the states combined, exerted upon their peculiar domain. It is the same Congress which passes both description of laws. The question, whether the law operates beyond the district, is the question upon the merits hereafter to be discussed.

Again, it is said, that the by-law alone is in question, and not the act of Congress: because the by-law is not passed by virtue of the act of Congress, but by virtue of the inherent power of the people of the district to govern themselves. The act of Congress only calls this inherent power into action: and this inherent power, when so called into action, is the only power which this court can deal with. The fallacy of this argument consists in its confounding inherent power with an inherent capacity to receive power. The subordinate legislative power of the *territories and [365 districts, which belong to the Union in full sovereignty, is not their power, but that of their superior. But admit this abstract doctrine of inherent power: the question still recurs, what is the constitutional effect of this power being exerted into action by the paramount power. The action of the inherent power will still depend upon the power by which it is set in motion; and what it can, or cannot do, under that impulse, is just the same question with the other.

It is also objected, that a law emanating from the local power of Congress over the District of Columbia, cannot bind the Union. But whether it can or not is the very question to be determined, when the merits come to be discussed; which the writ of error gives authority to decide; and which cannot be decided without entertaining the writ of error. The argument on the other side, proceeds in a vitious circle. It is asserted, that you must quash the writ of error, because you have no jurisdiction over the case or question. It is, then, said, that you must take jurisdiction of, and inquire into, the case and the question, in order that you may dismiss the writ of error; or, in other words, you have, and you have not, jurisdiction over the case and question, and you ought to decide them in order to see that you ought not to decide them. And here again the supposed absurdity of the claim of protection, by the defendant on the record, against the act of Virginia, is urged to authorize a refusal to inquire upon the writ of error, whether it is absurd or not.

366*] *3. The next ground of objection to the jurisdiction is, that the writ of error is itself a suit against a state by a citizen of that or some other state. And Bac. Abr. tit. Error (L.), is cited as an authority to show that a release of all suits is a release of a writ of error. But even admitting that it may sometimes be technically called a suit, it is not such a suit as is contemplated by the constitution. A writ of error, where a party is to be restored to something, may be released by a release of all suits or actions, because in this respect it resembles an action. But this writ of error is not a suit, because the party is not to be restored to anything. A reversal of the judgment below will leave things just as they were before the judgment. But the state of Virginia is not compelled to come into this court by the writ of error. A citation, or scire facias ad audiendum errores, is only notice to the state, leaving it at her option voluntarily to appear. It does not act compulsorily upon the state. It acts upon the court, which she has used as the instrument to enforce her law. A case is presented by the interference of the judiciary of the state, for the interposition of the appellate power of this court. The object is to reverse the judgment, and that done, there is an end of the exercise of power. The United States are liable to the same coercion. They may be called before this court in the same manner, and the judgments obtained in their favor may be reversed. And is it, then, derogatory to the sovereignty of a particular state, that its judgments should be liable to be controlled in the same manner, in 367*] cases within the judicial *power of the Union? This control is exerted upon the judiciary; upon the judgments of the judiciary. The state is incidentally affected; but that has been already determined in this court to be immaterial.<sup>1</sup> Nor is this sort of control more exceptionable than that which is constantly exercised, in suits between private parties, over the acts of the state legislatures and executives, upon the same ground of their repugnancy to the constitution and laws of the Union.

If it be asked whether you can give costs against the state, and enforce the payment, the answer is, that you cannot do so in any case upon a mere reversal of a judgment. And even if you could in a case between private parties, is it any objection to the appellate jurisdiction of this court, where the United States are plaintiffs below, that you cannot award and enforce the payment of costs against them? It is not jurisdiction over the state of Virginia that is claimed, but over a question arising under the laws of that state, and over the judgments of her courts construing those laws. This point is incidentally touched in Martin v. Hunter, in considering the question as to removal of suits, before judgment, and it is there said by the court that the remedy of removal of suits would be utterly inadequate to the purposes of the constitution, if it could act only on the parties, and not upon the state courts.<sup>2</sup>

*4. Lastly. It is insisted, for the de- [368 fendant in error, that this court has no jurisdiction in the present case, because a state is a party to the original controversy which the writ of error brings before the court. That the jurisdiction of this court in all cases, where a state is a party, is original, and therefore it cannot have appellate jurisdiction in this case.

The obvious answer to this argument is, that the jurisdiction now claimed does not arise under that part of the constitution which gives original jurisdiction to the Supreme Court in cases in which a state is a party; but the jurisdiction is asserted under that clause which gives the federal judiciary cognizance of all cases arising under the constitution, laws, and treaties of the United States, without regard to the character of the parties. In this latter class of cases the Supreme Court has appellate jurisdiction. In some of this description of cases, the jurisdiction could not be originally exercised. The penal laws of a state cannot be originally enforced, or enforced at all, by a judicature of the Union. They cannot therefore form the subject of, or create subjects for, its original jurisdiction. The courts of the United States can here exert only a controlling or restraining power for the protection of the rights of the Union, and this can only be done by appeal or writ of error. This view of the subject is taken in Martin v. Hunter. The court there says: "Suppose an indictment for a crime in a state court, and the defendant should allege, in his defense, that the crime was committed by an ex post facto act of the state; must not the state court, in *the exercise of a jurisdiction [369 which has already rightfully attached, have a right to pronounce on the sufficiency and validity of the defense? It would be extremely difficult, upon any legal principles, to give a negative answer to these inquiries. Innumerable instances of the same sort might be stated in illustration of the position; and unless the state courts could sustain jurisdiction in such cases, this clause of the sixth article would be without meaning or effect, and public mischiefs of a most enormous magnitude would inevitably ensue."<sup>3</sup> So the court afterwards say, in the context of the passage before cited, speaking of the inadequacy of the remedy of removal of suits to accomplish the purposes of the constitution, "in respect to criminal prosecutions, the difficulty seems admitted to be insurmountable,"<sup>2</sup> &c. What difficulty? The difficulty of controlling them by the courts of the United States without the aid of a writ of error, because those courts could take no original cognizance of this description of cases, and they could not be removed before judgment. As, then, the federal courts have no original jurisdiction of cases arising merely under the constitution, laws, and treaties of the Union, it follows, that the clause of the constitution which speaks of cases in which a state shall be a party, does not apply to it; and the appellate power, now in question, is to be sought for in that part of the same article which declares, that the judicial power of the Union shall extend to all 370* cases arising under the *constitution, laws, and treaties of the Union, coupled with the subsequent provision, which declares, that in all cases to which that judicial power extends, this court shall have appellate, where it has not original jurisdiction, with such exceptions, and under such regulations as Congress may prescribe. That it has appellate jurisdiction in all cases arising under the constitution, laws, and treaties of the United States, is established by the authority of the case of Martin v. Hunter; and that this appellate power is competent to control the state courts, is also proved by that case.<sup>1</sup> There is, therefore, no open question but this: Does the fact of a state being a party prosecutor in the state court, make this case an exception, and take it out of the general rule? Upon the plain policy and purpose of the constitution it does not. This jurisdiction has already been shown to be different in its nature from the original jurisdiction which was exercised over states before the amendment of the constitution. But that other jurisdiction will go far to show that there is nothing unnatural in giving appellate power over state courts in cases where a state is a party plaintiff. The constitution authorized direct coercion over states or private citizens indifferently. The amendment has partly taken this away; but the spirit of the constitution is still manifested by the former provision. The same constitution also authorized appellate control over state courts; and is it natural that it should condemn the same control, merely be- 371* cause *a state has obtained the judgment to be revised? The constitution had no delicacy with regard to states on this matter. It considered them as directly amenable where original jurisdiction can be exerted. Why not empower its tribunals to affect their interests in an appellate form, by acting, not on the state, but on its courts, as unquestionably it does in all cases where individuals are parties below? The appellate power is trifling, compared with the original as it formerly stood; and a constitution which gave the last could have no scruples about the first. The appellate control is respectful to the state sovereignties compared with the original; and it stands upon high considerations of self-defense, upon grounds of constitutional necessity not applicable to the other. The suability of the states might have been dispensed with, and the constitution still be safe. But the judicial control of the Union over state encroachments and usurpations, was indispensable to the sovereignty of the constitution—to its integrity—to its very existence. Take it away, and the Union becomes again a loose and feeble confederacy—a government of false and foolish confidence—a delusion and a mockery! Why is it in cases, in which individuals are parties in a state court, that the judgment may be revised in this court? Because the judiciary of the Union ought to possess ample power to preserve the constitution and laws, and treaties of the Union, from violation by other judicatures. Its judicial powers should be commensurate with its other powers and rights, and prerogatives. They might else be evaded and *trampled under foot by [*372 judicatures in which the constitution does not confide. This high motive is as strong, at least, where a state is plaintiff or prosecutor in its own courts, as where it is not. Indeed, it is far stronger; for all the motives to judicial leanings and partialities here operate in their fullest force, though the state judges may not be conscious of their influence. The sovereignty of the state law—state pride—state interests—are here in paramount vigor as inducements to error; and judicial usurpation is countenanced by legislative support and popular prejudice. Let the court look to the consequences of this distinction. A state passes a law repugnant to the national constitution. It gives a remedy in the name of an individual—a common informer. You may control this law, if the state judiciary acts upon it. But the state may avoid this (as it seems) by authorizing the remedy in its own name; and you thus lose your protecting jurisdiction over the subject, although you might still exercise it, as in the other case, in the inoffensive mode of confining your control to the state judiciary. The whole constitution of the Union might thus be overturned unless force should be resorted to; and the object of the constitution was to avoid force, by giving ordinary judicial power of correction.

1.—Wheat. Dig. Dec. tit. Const. Law, V. (C.) 211.

2.—1 Wheat. Rep. 350.

3.—1 Wheat. Rep. 341.

It has been said that a sovereign state of the Union is not amenable to judicature, unless made so by express words—eo nomine. I deny this as respects appellate jurisdiction, which acts, not on the state, but on its courts. The words of the constitution *are suffi- [*373 ciently express, and all reason is on that side; especially since it is, or must be admitted, that these courts may be thus controlled, and the legislative power of the state be reached through them, and controlled also; and especially, too, when the constitution has not scrupled, in other cases, to subject the states to direct control.

But it is contended, that there are cases arising under the constitution and laws of the Union, which, from their very nature, are not the subjects of judicial cognizance, and consequently are exceptions out of the general grant of judicial power under the constitution; such as the prohibition to the states to grant titles of nobility, &c.; and that the present case may be such an exception. But the very supposition admits, that if the case in question is suited to the exertion of judicial power, it is not an exception; and the moment a state judiciary intervenes, judicial jurisdiction can, and ought to be exerted. It is unnecessary to inquire how the case must, in general, exist, in order to become the proper object of judicial cognizance; for here it does exist in a proper shape for that purpose. A state court has intervened, and the regular appellate power of this court may act. Nor does the proof of some exceptions, arising from necessity, establish other exceptions free from that necessity. Many unlawful things cannot be restrained by judicature; but does it follow that where they can be restrained, they shall not?

Again. It is said that the states may destroy the federal government at their pleasure, mere-

374*] ly by forbearing *to elect senators, and to provide for the election of a President and representatives, and that the authority of the Union is incompetent to coerce them. Such extreme arguments prove nothing to the present purpose; but suppose the states could not be coerced in such a case to do their duty, because no intervening court or agent is necessary to the accomplishment of such a desperate purpose, does this prove that you cannot defensively control active violations of the constitution or laws, when a controllable judicature or agent intervenes to perpetrate these violations?

It is also said, that this is a prosecution under a penal statute, and that criminal cases peculiarly belong to the domestic forum. The answer is, that so was the case of M' Culloch v. Maryland, a qui tam action, under a penal law of that state, giving one-half of the penalty to the state, and the other half to the informer; yet this court did not consider the nature of the suit, or the circumstance of a state being a party, as forming a valid objection to the jurisdiction.<sup>1</sup> Nobody objects to a state enforcing its own penal laws; all that is claimed is, that in executing them, it should not violate the laws of the Union, which are paramount. Sic utere tuo ut alienum non laedas.

The other suppositions which have been stated of bills of attainder and ex post facto laws passed by the states, and attempted to be executed, but decided by this court to be unconstitutional, and yet the *state courts persisting in carrying them into effect, even in capital cases, are too wild and extravagant to illustrate any question which can ever practically arise.

Mr. Chief Justice MARSHALL delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a writ of error to a judgment rendered in the Court of Hustings for the borough of Norfolk, on an information for selling lottery tickets, contrary to an act of the legislature of Virginia. In the state court, the defendant claimed the protection of an act of Congress. A case was agreed between the parties, which states the act of Assembly on which the prosecution was founded, and the act of Congress on which the defendant relied, and concludes in these words: "If upon this case the court shall be of opinion that the acts of Congress before mentioned were valid, and on the true construction of those acts, the lottery tickets sold by the defendants as aforesaid, might lawfully be sold within the state of Virginia, notwithstanding the act or statute of the General Assembly of Virginia prohibiting such sale, then judgment to be entered for the defendants. And if the court should be of opinion that the statute or act of the General Assembly of the state of Virginia, prohibiting such sale, is valid, notwithstanding the said acts of Congress, then judgment to be entered that the defendants are guilty, and that the commonwealth recover against them one hundred dollars and costs.

376*] *Judgment was rendered against the defendants; and the court in which it was rendered being the highest court of the state in which the cause was cognizable, the record has been brought into this court by a writ of error.<sup>2</sup>

The defendant in error moves to dismiss this writ, for want of jurisdiction.

In support of this motion, three points have been made, and argued with the ability which the importance of the question merits. These points are:

1st. That a state is a defendant.

2d. That no writ of error lies from this court to a state court.

3d. The third point has been presented in different forms by the gentlemen who have argued it. The counsel who opened the cause said, that the want of jurisdiction was shown by the subject-matter of the case. The counsel who followed him said, that jurisdiction was not given by the judiciary act. The court has bestowed all its attention on the arguments of both gentlemen, and supposes that their tendency is to show that this court has no jurisdiction of the case, or, in other words, has no right to review the judgment of the state court, because neither the constitution nor any law of the United States has been violated by that judgment.

The questions presented to the court by the two *first points made at the bar are [377 of great magnitude, and may be truly said vitally to affect the Union. They exclude the inquiry whether the constitution and laws of the United States have been violated by the judgment which the plaintiffs in error seek to review; and maintain that, admitting such violation, it is not in the power of the government to apply a corrective. They maintain that the nation does not possess a department capable of restraining peaceably, and by authority of law, any attempts which may be made, by a part, against the legitimate powers of the whole; and that the government is reduced to the alternative of submitting to such attempts, or of resisting them by force. They maintain that the constitution of the United States has provided no tribunal for the final construction of itself, or of the laws or treaties of the nation; but that this power may be exercised in the last resort by the courts of every state of the Union. That the constitution, laws, and treaties, may receive as many constructions as there are states; and that this is not a mischief, or, if a mischief, is irremediable. These abstract propositions are to be determined; for he who demands decision without permitting inquiry, affirms that the decision he asks does not depend on inquiry.

If such be the constitution, it is the duty of the court to bow with respectful submission to its provisions. If such be not the constitution, it is equally the duty of this court to say so; and to perform that task which the American people have assigned to the judicial department.

*1st. The first question to be con- [378 sidered is, whether the jurisdiction of this court is excluded by the character of the parties, one of them being a state, and the other a citizen of that state?

The second section of the third article of the 2.—The plaintiff in error prayed an appeal from the judgment of the Court of Hustings, but it was refused, on the ground that there was no higher state tribunal which could take cognizance of the case.

1.—4 Wheat. Rep. 316.

constitution defines the extent of the judicial power of the United States. Jurisdiction is given to the courts of the Union in two classes of cases. In the first, their jurisdiction depends on the character of the cause, whoever may be the parties. This class comprehends "all cases in law and equity arising under this constitution, the laws of the United States, and treaties made, or which shall be made, under their authority." This clause extends the jurisdiction of the court to all the cases described, without making in its terms any exception whatever, and without any regard to the condition of the party. If there be any exception, it is to be implied against the express words of the article.

In the second class, the jurisdiction depends entirely on the character of the parties. In this are comprehended "controversies between two or more states, between a state and citizens of another state," "and between a state and foreign states, citizens or subjects." If these be the parties, it is entirely unimportant what may be the subject of controversy. Be it what it may, these parties have a constitutional right to come into the courts of the Union.

The counsel for the defendant in error have stated that the cases which arise under the constitution must grow out of those provisions 379* which are capable *of self-execution; examples of which are to be found in the 2d section of the 4th article, and in the 10th section of the 1st article.

A case which arises under a law of the United States must, we are likewise told, be a right given by some act which becomes necessary to execute the powers given in the constitution, of which the law of naturalization is mentioned as an example.

The use intended to be made of this exposition of the first part of the section, defining the extent of the judicial power, is not clearly understood. If the intention be merely to distinguish cases arising under the constitution, from those arising under a law, for the sake of precision in the application of this argument, these propositions will not be controverted. If it be to maintain that a case arising under the constitution, or a law, must be one in which a party comes into court to demand something conferred on him by the constitution or a law, we think the construction too narrow. A case in law or equity consists of the right of the one party, as well as of the other, and may truly be said to arise under the constitution or a law of the United States, whenever its correct decision depends on the construction of either. Congress seems to have intended to give its own construction of this part of the constitution in the 25th section of the judiciary act; and we perceive no reason to depart from that construction.

The jurisdiction of the court, then, being extended by the letter of the constitution to all cases arising under it, or under the laws of the United States, it follows that those who would 380* withdraw *any case of this description from that jurisdiction, must sustain the exemption they claim on the spirit and true meaning of the constitution, which spirit and true meaning must be so apparent as to overrule the words which its framers have employed.

The counsel for the defendant in error have undertaken to do this; and have laid down the Wheat. 6.

general proposition, that a sovereign independent state is not suable except by its own consent.

This general proposition will not be controverted. But its consent is not requisite in each particular case. It may be given in a general law. And if a state has surrendered any portion of its sovereignty, the question whether a liability to suit be a part of this portion, depends on the instrument by which the surrender is made. If, upon a just construction of that instrument, it shall appear that the state has submitted to be sued, then it has parted with this sovereign right of judging in every case on the justice of its own pretensions, and has entrusted that power to a tribunal in whose impartiality it confides.

The American States, as well as the American people, have believed a close and firm Union to be essential to their liberty and to their happiness. They have been taught by experience, that this Union cannot exist without a government for the whole; and they have been taught by the same experience that this government would be a mere shadow, that must disappoint all their hopes, unless invested with large portions of that sovereignty which belongs to independent states. Under the influence of this opinion, and thus instructed by experience, *the American people, in [381 the conventions of their respective states, adopted the present constitution.

If it could be doubted, whether from its nature, it were not supreme in all cases where it is empowered to act, that doubt would be removed by the declaration, that "this constitution, and the laws of the United States, which shall be made in pursuance thereof, and all treaties made, or which shall be made, under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land; and the judges in every state shall be bound thereby; anything in the constitution or laws of any state to the contrary notwithstanding."

This is the authoritative language of the American people; and, if gentlemen please, of the American States. It marks, with lines too strong to be mistaken, the characteristic distinction between the government of the Union and those of the states. The general government, though limited as to its objects, is supreme with respect to those objects. This principle is a part of the constitution; and if there be any who deny its necessity, none can deny its authority.

To this supreme government ample powers are confided; and if it were possible to doubt the great purposes for which they were so confided, the people of the United States have declared, that they are given "in order to form a more perfect union, establish justice, ensure domestic tranquility, provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to themselves and their posterity."

*With the ample powers confided to [382 this supreme government, for these interesting purposes, are connected many express and important limitations on the sovereignty of the states, which are made for the same purposes. The powers of the Union, on the great subjects of war, peace, and commerce, and on many others, are in themselves limitations of the sovereignty of the states; but in addition to these, the sovereignty of the states is surrendered in many instances where the surrender can only operate to the benefit of the people, and where, perhaps, no other power is conferred on Congress than a conservative power to maintain the principles established in the constitution. The maintenance of these principles in their purity, is certainly among the great duties of the government. One of the instruments by which this duty may be peaceably performed, is the judicial department. It is authorized to decide all cases of every description, arising under the constitution or laws of the United States. From this general grant of jurisdiction, no exception is made of those cases in which a state may be a party. When we consider the situation of the government of the Union and of a state, in relation to each other; the nature of our constitution; the subordination of the state governments to that constitution; the great purpose for which jurisdiction over all cases arising under the constitution<sup>a</sup> and laws of the United States is confided to the judicial department, are we at liberty to insert in this general grant, an exception of those cases in which a state may be a 383 *party? Will the spirit of the constitution justify this attempt to control its words? We think it will not. We think a case arising under the constitution or laws of the United States, is cognizable in the courts of the Union, whoever may be the parties to that case.

Had any doubt existed with respect to the just construction of this part of the section, that doubt would have been removed by the enumeration of those cases to which the jurisdiction of the federal courts is extended, in consequence of the character of the parties. In that enumeration, we find, "controversies between two or more states, between a state and citizen of another state," "and between a state and foreign states, citizens, or subjects."

One of the express objects, then, for which the judicial department was established, is the decision of controversies between states, and between a state and individuals. The mere circumstance, that a state is a party, gives jurisdiction to the court. How, then, can it be contended, that the very same instrument, in the very same section, should be so construed as that this same circumstance should withdraw a case from the jurisdiction of the court, where the constitution or laws of the United States are supposed to have been violated? The constitution gave to every person having a claim upon a state, a right to submit his case to the court of the nation. However unimportant his claim might be, however little the community might be interested in its decision, the framers of our constitution thought it necessary, for the purposes of justice, to provide a tribunal 384 *as superior to influence as possible, in which that claim might be decided. Can it be imagined, that the same persons considered a case involving the constitution of our country and the majesty of the laws—questions in which every American citizen must be deeply interested—as withdrawn from this tribunal, because a state is a party?

While weighing arguments drawn from the nature of government, and from the general spirit of an instrument, and urged for the purpose of narrowing the construction which the words of that instrument seem to require, it is proper to place in the opposite scale those principles, drawn from the same sources, which go to sustain the words in their full operation and natural import. One of these, which has been pressed with great force by the counsel for the plaintiffs in error, is, that the judicial power of every well-constituted government must be co-extensive with the legislative, and must be capable of deciding every judicial question which grows out of the constitution and laws.

If any proposition may be considered as a political axiom, this, we think, may be so considered. In reasoning upon it as an abstract question, there would, probably, exist no contrariety of opinion respecting it. Every argument, proving the necessity of the department, proves also the propriety of giving this extent to it. We do not mean to say, that the jurisdiction of the courts of the Union should be construed to be co-extensive with the legislative, merely because it is fit that it should be so; but we mean to say, that this fitness furnishes an argument *in construing the 385 constitution which ought never to be overlooked, and which is most especially entitled to consideration, when we are inquiring, whether the words of the instrument which purport to establish this principle, shall be contracted for the purpose of destroying it.

The mischievous consequences of the construction contended for on the part of Virginia, are also entitled to great consideration. It would prostrate, it has been said, the government and its laws at the feet of every state in the Union. And would not this be its effect? What power of the government could be executed by its own means, in any state disposed to resist its execution by a course of legislation? The laws must be executed by individuals acting within the several states. If these individuals may be exposed to penalties, and if the courts of the Union cannot correct the judgments by which these penalties may be enforced, the course of the government may be, at any time, arrested by the will of one of its members. Each member will possess a veto on the will of the whole.

The answer which has been given to this argument, does not deny its truth, but insists that confidence is reposed, and may be safely reposed, in the state institutions; and that, if they shall ever become so insane or so wicked as to seek the destruction of the government, they may accomplish their object by refusing to perform the functions assigned to them.

We readily concur with the counsel for the defendant, *in the declaration that the 386 cases which have been put of direct legislative resistance for the purpose of opposing the acknowledged powers of the government, are extreme cases, and in the hope that they will never occur; but we cannot help believing, that a general conviction of the total incapacity of the government to protect itself and its laws in such cases, would contribute in no inconsiderable degree to their occurrence.

Let it be admitted, that the cases which have been put are extreme and improbable, yet there are gradations of opposition to the laws, far short of those cases, which might have a baneful influence on the affairs of the nation.

Different states may entertain different opinions on the true construction of the constitutional powers of Congress. We know, that at one time, the assumption of the debts contracted by the several states, during the war of our revolution, was deemed unconstitutional by some of them. We know, too, that at other times, certain taxes, imposed by Congress, have been pronounced unconstitutional. Other laws have been questioned partially, while they were supported by the great majority of the American people. We have no assurance that we shall be less divided than we have been. States may legislate in conformity to their opinions, and may enforce those opinions by penalties. It would be hazarding too much to assert, that the judicatures of the states will be exempt from the prejudices by which the legislatures and people are influenced, and will constitute perfectly impartial tribunals. In many states the judges are dependent for office and 387* for salary on the will of the legislature. The constitution of the United States furnishes no security against the universal adoption of this principle. When we observe the importance which that constitution attaches to the independence of judges, we are the less inclined to suppose that it can have intended to leave these constitutional questions to tribunals where this independence may not exist, in all cases where a state shall prosecute an individual who claims the protection of an act of Congress. These prosecutions may take place even without a legislative act. A person making a seizure under an act of Congress, may be indicted as a trespasser, if force has been employed, and of this a jury may judge. How extensive may be the mischief if the first decisions in such cases should be final!

These collisions may take place in times of no extraordinary commotion. But a constitution is framed for ages to come, and is designed to approach immortality as nearly as human institutions can approach it. Its course cannot always be tranquil. It is exposed to storms and tempests, and its framers must be unwise statesmen indeed, if they have not provided it, as far as its nature will permit, with the means of self-preservation from the perils it may be destined to encounter. No government ought to be so defective in its organization as not to contain within itself the means of securing the execution of its own laws against other dangers than those which occur every day. Courts of justice are the means most usually employed; and it is reasonable to expect that a government should repose 388* on its own courts, rather than on others. There is certainly nothing in the circumstances under which our constitution was formed; nothing in the history of the times, which would justify the opinion that the confidence reposed in the states was so implicit as to leave in them and their tribunals the power of resisting or defeating, in the form of law, the legitimate measures of the Union. The requisitions of Congress, under the confederation, were as constitutionally obligatory as the laws enacted by the present Congress. That they were habitually disregarded, is a fact of universal notoriety. With a knowledge of this fact, and under its full pressure, a convention was assembled to change the system. Is it so improbable that they should confer on the judicial department the power of construing the constitution and laws of the Union in every case, in the last resort, and of preserving them from all violation from every quarter, so far as judicial decisions can preserve them, that this improbability should essentially affect the construction of the new system? We are told, and we are truly told, that the great change which is to give efficacy to the present system, is its ability to act on individuals directly, instead of acting through the instrumentality of state governments. But, ought not this ability, in reason and sound policy, to be applied directly to the protection of individuals employed in the execution of the laws, as well as to their coercion. Your laws reach the individual without the aid of any other power; why may they not protect him from punishment for performing his duty in executing them?

*The counsel for Virginia endeavor [389] to obviate the force of these arguments by saying, that the dangers they suggest, if not imaginary, are inevitable; that the constitution can make no provision against them; and that, therefore, in construing that instrument, they ought to be excluded from our consideration. This state of things, they say, cannot arise until there shall be a disposition so hostile to the present political system as to produce a determination to destroy it; and, when that determination shall be produced, its effects will not be restrained by parchment stipulations. The fate of the constitution will not then depend on judicial decisions. But, should no appeal be made to force, the states can put an end to the government by refusing to act. They have only not to elect senators, and it expires without a struggle.

It is very true that, whenever hostility to the existing system shall become universal, it will be also irresistible. The people made the constitution, and the people can unmake it. It is the creature of their own will, and lives only by their will. But this supreme and irresistible power to make or to unmake, resides only in the whole body of the people; not in any sub-division of them. The attempt of any of the parts to exercise it is usurpation, and ought to be repelled by those to whom the people have delegated their power of repelling it.

The acknowledged inability of the government, then, to sustain itself against the public will, and, by force or otherwise, to control the whole nation, is no sound argument in support of its constitutional *inability to pre- [390] serve itself against a section of the nation acting in opposition to the general will.

It is true, that if all the states, or a majority of them, refuse to elect senators, the legislative powers of the Union will be suspended. But if any one state shall refuse to elect them, the Senate will not, on that account, be the less capable of performing all its functions. The argument founded on this fact would seem rather to prove the subordination of the parts to the whole, than the complete independence of any one of them. The framers of the constitution were, indeed, unable to make any provisions which should protect that instrument against a general combination of the states, or of the people, for its destruction; and, conscious of this inability, they have not made the attempt. But they were able to provide against the operation of measures adopted in any one state, whose tendency might be to arrest the execution of the laws, and this it was the part of true wisdom to attempt. We think they have attempted it.

It has been also urged, as an additional objection to the jurisdiction of the court, that cases between a state and one of its own citizens, do not come within the general scope of the constitution; and were obviously never intended to be made cognizable in the federal courts. The state tribunals might be suspected of partiality in cases between itself or its citizens and aliens, or the citizens of another state, but not in proceedings by a state against its own citizens. That jealousy which might exist in the first case, could not exist in the last, and therefore the judicial power is not extended to the last.

391*] *This is very true, so far as jurisdiction depends on the character of the parties; and the argument would have great force if urged to prove that this court could not establish the demand of a citizen upon his state, but is not entitled to the same force when urged to prove that this court cannot inquire whether the constitution or laws of the United States protect a citizen from a prosecution instituted against him by a state. If jurisdiction depended entirely on the character of the parties, and was not given where the parties have not an original right to come into court, that part of the 2d section of the 3d article which extends the judicial power to all cases arising under the constitution and laws of the United States, would be mere surplusage. It is to give jurisdiction where the character of the parties would not give it, that this very important part of the clause was inserted. It may be true, that the partiality of the state tribunals, in ordinary controversies between a state and its citizens, was not apprehended, and therefore the judicial power of the Union was not extended to such cases; but this was not the sole nor the greatest object for which this department was created. A more important, a much more interesting object, was the preservation of the constitution and laws of the United States, so far as they can be preserved by judicial authority; and therefore the jurisdiction of the courts of the Union was expressly extended to all cases arising under that constitution and those laws. If the constitution or laws may be violated by proceedings 392*] *instituted by a state against its own citizens, and if that violation may be such as essentially to affect the constitution and the laws, such as to arrest the progress of government in its constitutional course, why should these cases be excepted from that provision which expressly extends the judicial power of the Union to all cases arising under the constitution and laws?

After bestowing on this subject the most attentive consideration, the court can perceive no reason founded on the character of the parties for introducing an exception which the constitution has not made; and we think that the judicial power, as originally given, extends to all cases arising under the constitution or a law of the United States, whoever may be the parties.

It has been also contended, that this jurisdiction, if given, is original, and cannot be exercised in the appellate form.

The words of the constitution are, "in all cases affecting ambassadors, other public ministers, and consuls, and those in which a state shall be a party, the Supreme Court shall have original jurisdiction. In all the other cases before mentioned, the Supreme Court shall have appellate jurisdiction."

This distinction between original and appellate jurisdiction, excludes, we are told, in all cases, the exercise of the one where the other is given.

The constitution gives the Supreme Court original jurisdiction in certain enumerated cases, and gives it appellate jurisdiction in all others.

Among those in which jurisdiction must be exercised in the appellate *form, are [*393 cases arising under the constitution and laws of the United States. These provisions of the constitution are equally obligatory, and are to be equally respected. If a state be a party, the jurisdiction of this court is original; if the case arise under a constitution or a law, the jurisdiction is appellate. But a case to which a state is a party may arise under the constitution or a law of the United States. What rule is applicable to such a case? What, then, becomes the duty of the court? Certainly, we think, so to construe the constitution as to give effect to both provisions, as far as it is possible to reconcile them, and not to permit their seeming repugnancy to destroy each other. We must endeavor so to construe them as to preserve the true intent and meaning of the instrument.

In one description of cases, the jurisdiction of the court is founded entirely on the character of the parties; and the nature of the controversy is not contemplated by the constitution. The character of the parties is everything, the nature of the case nothing. In the other description of cases, the jurisdiction is founded entirely on the character of the case, and the parties are not contemplated by the constitution. In these, the nature of the case is everything, the character of the parties nothing. When, then, the constitution declares the jurisdiction, in cases where a state shall be a party, to be original, and in all cases arising under the constitution or a law, to be appellate, the conclusion seems irresistible, that its framers designed to include in the first class *those cases in which [*394 jurisdiction is given, because a state is a party; and to include in the second, those in which jurisdiction is given, because the case arises under the constitution or a law.

This reasonable construction is rendered necessary by other considerations.

That the constitution or a law of the United States, is involved in a case, and makes a part of it, may appear in the progress of a cause in which the courts of the Union, but for that circumstance, would have no jurisdiction, and which of consequence could not originate in the Supreme Court. In such a case, the jurisdiction can be exercised only in its appellate form. To deny its exercise in this form is to deny its existence, and would be to construe a clause, dividing the power of the Supreme Court, in such a manner as in a considerable degree to defeat the power itself. All must perceive, that this construction can be justified only where it is absolutely necessary. We do not think the article under consideration presents that necessity.

It is observable, that in this distributive clause, no negative words are introduced. This observation is not made for the purpose of contending that the legislature may "apportion the judicial power between the supreme and inferior courts according to its will." That would be, as was said by this court in the case of Marbury v. Madison, to render the distributive clause "mere surplusage," to make it "form without substance." This cannot, therefore, be the true construction of the article.

395*] *But although the absence of negative words will not authorize the legislature to disregard the distribution of the power previously granted, their absence will justify a sound construction of the whole article, so as to give every part its intended effect. It is admitted, that "affirmative words are often, in their operation, negative of other objects than those affirmed;" and that where "a negative or exclusive sense must be given to them, or they have no operation at all," they must receive that negative or exclusive sense. But where they have full operation without it; where it would destroy some of the most important objects for which the power was created; then, we think, affirmative words ought not to be construed negatively.

The constitution declares, that in cases where a state is a party, the Supreme Court shall have original jurisdiction; but does not say that its appellate jurisdiction shall not be exercised in cases where, from their nature, appellate jurisdiction is given, whether a state be or be not a party. It may be conceded, that where the case is of such a nature as to admit of its originating in the Supreme Court, it ought to originate there; but where, from its nature, it cannot originate in that court, these words ought not to be so construed as to require it. There are many cases in which it would be found extremely difficult, and subversive of the spirit of the constitution, to maintain the construction, that appellate jurisdiction cannot be exercised where one of the parties might sue or be sued in this court.

The constitution defines the jurisdiction of 396*] the *Supreme Court, but does not define that of the inferior courts. Can it be affirmed, that a state might not sue the citizen of another state in a circuit court? Should the Circuit Court decide for or against its jurisdiction, should it dismiss the suit, or give judgment against the state, might not its decision be revised in the Supreme Court? The argument is, that it could not; and the very clause which is urged to prove that the Circuit Court could give no judgment in the case, is also urged to prove that its judgment is irreversible. A supervising court, whose peculiar province it is to correct the errors of an inferior court, has no power to correct a judgment given without jurisdiction, because, in the same case, that supervising court has original jurisdiction. Had negative words been employed, it would be difficult to give them this construction if they would admit of any other. But, without negative words, this irrational construction can never be maintained.

So, too, in the same clause, the jurisdiction of the court is declared to be original, "in cases affecting ambassadors, other public ministers, and consuls." There is, perhaps, no part of the article under consideration so much required by national policy as this; unless it be that part which extends the judicial power "to all cases arising under the constitution, laws, and treaties of the United States." It has been generally held, that the state courts have a concurrent jurisdiction with the federal courts, in cases to which the judicial power is extended, unless the jurisdiction of the federal courts be rendered exclusive *by the words of the [397 third article. If the words, "to all cases," give exclusive jurisdiction in cases affecting foreign ministers, they may also give exclusive jurisdiction, if such be the will of Congress, in cases arising under the constitution, laws, and treaties of the United States. Now, suppose an individual were to sue a foreign minister in a state court, and that court were to maintain its jurisdiction, and render judgment against the minister, could it be contended, that this court would be incapable of revising such judgment, because the constitution had given it original jurisdiction in the case? If this could be maintained, then a clause inserted for the purpose of excluding the jurisdiction of all other courts than this, in a particular case, would have the effect of excluding the jurisdiction of this court in that very case, if the suit were to be brought in another court, and that court were to assert jurisdiction. This tribunal, according to the argument which has been urged, could neither revise the judgment of such other court, nor suspend its proceedings; for a writ of prohibition, or any other similar writ, is in the nature of appellate process.

Foreign consuls frequently assert, in our prize courts, the claims of their fellow subjects. These suits are maintained by them as consuls. The appellate power of this court has been frequently exercised in such cases, and has never been questioned. It would be extremely mischievous to withhold its exercise. Yet the consul is a party on the record. The truth is, that where the words confer only appellate jurisdiction, original jurisdiction is most *clearly not given; but where the words [398 admit of appellate jurisdiction, the power to take cognizance of the suit originally, does not necessarily negative the power to decide upon it on an appeal, if it may originate in a different court.

It is, we think, apparent, that to give this distributive clause the interpretation contended for, to give to its affirmative words a negative operation, in every possible case, would, in some instances, defeat the obvious intention of the article. Such an interpretation would not consist with those rules which, from time immemorial, have guided courts, in their construction of instruments brought under their consideration. It must, therefore, be discarded. Every part of the article must be taken into view, and that construction adopted which will consist with its words, and promote its general intention. The court may imply a negative from affirmative words, where the implication promotes, not where it defeats the intention.

If we apply this principle, the correctness of which we believe will not be controverted, to the distributive clause under consideration, the result, we think, would be this: the original jurisdiction of the Supreme Court, in cases where a state is a party, refers to those cases in which, according to the grant of power made in the preceding clause, jurisdiction might be exercised in consequence of the character of the party, and an original suit might be instituted in any of the federal courts; not to those cases in which an original suit might not be 399* *instituted in a federal court. Of the last description, is every case between a state and its citizens, and, perhaps, every case in which a state is enforcing its penal laws. In such cases, therefore, the Supreme Court cannot take original jurisdiction. In every other case, that is, in every case to which the judicial power extends, and in which original jurisdiction is not expressly given, that judicial power shall be exercised in the appellate, and only in the appellate form. The original jurisdiction of this court cannot be enlarged, but its appellate jurisdiction may be exercised in every case cognizable under the third article of the constitution, in the federal courts, in which original jurisdiction cannot be exercised; and the extent of this judicial power is to be measured, not by giving the affirmative words of the distributive clause a negative operation in every possible case, but by giving their true meaning to the words which define its extent.

The counsel for the defendant in error urge, in opposition to this rule of construction, some dicta of the court, in the case of Marbury v. Madison.

It is a maxim not to be disregarded, that general expressions, in every opinion, are to be taken in connection with the case in which those expressions are used. If they go beyond the case, they may be respected, but ought not to control the judgment in a subsequent suit when the very point is presented for decision. The reason of this maxim is obvious. The question actually before the court is investigated with care and considered in its full extent. Other principles which may serve to illustrate it, are 400* considered* in their relation to the case decided, but their possible bearing on all other cases is seldom completely investigated.

In the case of Marbury v. Madison, the single question before the court, so far as that case can be applied to this, was, whether the legislature could give this court original jurisdiction in a case in which the constitution had clearly not given it, and in which no doubt respecting the construction of the article could possibly be raised. The court decided, and we think very properly, that the legislature could not give original jurisdiction in such a case. But, in the reasoning of the court in support of this decision, some expressions are used which go far beyond it. The counsel for Marbury had insisted on the unlimited discretion of the legislature in the apportionment of the judicial power; and it is against this argument that the reasoning of the court is directed. They say that, if such had been the intention of the article, "it would certainly have been useless to proceed farther than to define the judicial power, and the tribunals in which it should be vested." The court says, that such a construction would render the clause, dividing the jurisdiction of the court into original and appellate, totally useless; that "affirmative words are often, in their operation, negative of other objects than those which are affirmed; and, in this case (in the case of Marbury v. Madison), a negative or exclusive sense must be given to them, or they have no operation at all." "It cannot be presumed," adds the court, "that any clause in the constitution is intended to be without *effect; and, therefore, such a [401 construction is inadmissible, unless the words require it."

The whole reasoning of the court proceeds upon the idea that the affirmative words of the clause giving one sort of jurisdiction, must imply a negative of any other sort of jurisdiction, because otherwise the words would be totally inoperative, and this reasoning is advanced in a case to which it was strictly applicable. If in that case original jurisdiction could have been exercised, the clause under consideration would have been entirely useless. Having such cases only in its view, the court lays down a principle which is generally correct, in terms much broader than the decision, and not only much broader than the reasoning with which that decision is supported, but in some instances contradictory to its principle. The reasoning sustains the negative operation of the words in that case, because otherwise the clause would have no meaning whatever, and because such operation was necessary to give effect to the intention of the article. The effort now made is, to apply the conclusion to which the court was conducted by that reasoning in the particular case, to one in which the words have their full operation when understood affirmatively, and in which the negative, or exclusive sense, is to be so used as to defeat some of the great objects of the article.

To this construction the court cannot give its assent. The general expressions in the case of Marbury v. Madison must be understood with the limitations which are given to them in this opinion; limitations *which in no [402 degree affect the decision in that case, or the tenor of its reasoning.

The counsel who closed the argument put several cases for the purpose of illustration, which he supposed to arise under the constitution, and yet to be, apparently, without the jurisdiction of the court.

Were a state to lay a duty on exports, to collect the money and place it in her treasury, could the citizen who paid it, he asks, maintain a suit in this court against such state, to recover back the money?

Perhaps not. Without, however, deciding such supposed case, we may say, that it is entirely unlike that under consideration.

The citizen who has paid his money to his state, under a law that is void, is in the same situation with every other person who has paid money by mistake. The law raises an assumpsit to return the money, and it is upon that assumpsit that the action is to be maintained. To refuse to comply with this assumpsit may be no more a violation of the constitution than to refuse to comply with any other; and as the federal courts never had jurisdiction over contracts between a state and its citizens, they may have none over this. But let us so vary the supposed case as to give it a real resemblance to that under consideration. Suppose a citizen refuse to pay this export duty, and a suit be instituted for the purpose of compelling him to pay it. He pleads the constitution of the United States in bar of the action, notwithstanding which the court gives judgment against him. This would be a case arising 403* under *the constitution, and would be the very case now before the court.

We are also asked, if a state should confiscate property secured by a treaty, whether the individual could maintain an action for that property.

If the property confiscated be debts, our own experience informs us that the remedy of the creditor against his debtor remains. If it be land which is secured by a treaty, and afterwards confiscated by a state, the argument does not assume that this title, thus secured, could be extinguished by an act of confiscation. The injured party, therefore, has his remedy against the occupant of the land for that which the treaty secures to him, not against the state for money which is not secured to him.

The case of a state which pays off its own debts with paper money, no more resembles this than do those to which we have already adverted. The courts have no jurisdiction over the contract. They cannot enforce it, nor judge of its violation. Let it be that the act discharging the debt is a mere nullity, and that it is still due. Yet the federal courts have no cognizance of the case. But suppose a state to institute proceedings against an individual, which depended on the validity of an act emitting bills of credit; suppose a state to prosecute one of its citizens for refusing paper money, who should plead the constitution in bar of such prosecution. If his plea should be overruled and judgment rendered against him, his case would resemble this; and, unless the jurisdiction of this court might be exercised 404* over it, the constitution would *be violated, and the injured party be unable to bring his case before that tribunal to which the people of the United States have assigned all such cases.

It is most true that this court will not take jurisdiction if it should not; but it is equally true, that it must take jurisdiction if it should. The judiciary cannot, as the legislature may, avoid a measure because it approaches the confines of the constitution. We cannot pass it by because it is doubtful. With whatever doubts, with whatever difficulties, a case may be attended, we must decide it if it be brought before us. We have no more right to decline the exercise of jurisdiction which is given, than to usurp that which is not given. The one or the other would be treason to the constitution. Questions may occur which we would gladly avoid, but we cannot avoid them. All we can do, is to exercise our best judgment, and conscientiously to perform our duty. In doing this, on the present occasion, we find this tribunal invested with appellate jurisdiction in all cases arising under the constitution and laws of the United States. We find no exception to this grant, and we cannot insert one.

To escape the operation of these comprehensive words, the counsel for the defendant has mentioned instances in which the constitution might be violated without giving jurisdiction to this court. These words, therefore, however universal in their expression, must, he contends, be limited and controlled in their construction by circumstances. One of these instances is, the grant by a state of a patent of nobility. The court, he says, cannot annul this grant.

Wheat. 6.

*This may be very true; but by no [*405] means justifies the inference drawn from it. The article does not extend the judicial power to every violation of the constitution which may possibly take place, but to "a case in law or equity," in which a right, under such law, is asserted in a court of justice. If the question cannot be brought into a court, then there is no case in law or equity, and no jurisdiction is given by the words of the article. But if, in any controversy depending in a court, the cause should depend on the validity of such a law, that would be a case arising under the constitution, to which the judicial power of the United States would extend. The same observation applies to the other instances with which the counsel who opened the cause has illustrated this argument. Although they show that there may be violations of the constitution, of which the courts can take no cognizance, they do not show that an interpretation more restrictive than the words themselves import ought to be given to this article. They do not show that there can be "a case in law or equity," arising under the constitution, to which the judicial power does not extend.

We think, then, that, as the constitution originally stood, the appellate jurisdiction of this court, in all cases arising under the constitution, laws, or treaties of the United States, was not arrested by the circumstance that a state was a party.

This leads to a consideration of the 11th amendment.

It is in these words: "The judicial power of the United States shall not be construed to extend to any *suit in law or equity com- [*406] menced or prosecuted against one of the United States, by citizens of another state, or by citizens or subjects of any foreign state."

It is a part of our history, that, at the adoption of the constitution, all the states were greatly indebted; and the apprehension that these debts might be prosecuted in the federal courts, formed a very serious objection to that instrument. Suits were instituted; and the court maintained its jurisdiction. The alarm was general; and, to quiet the apprehensions that were so extensively entertained, this amendment was proposed in Congress, and adopted by the state legislatures. That its motive was not to maintain the sovereignty of a state from the degradation supposed to attend a compulsory appearance before the tribunal of the nation, may be inferred from the terms of the amendment. It does not comprehend controversies between two or more states, or between a state and a foreign state. The jurisdiction of the court still extends to these cases; and in these a state may still be sued. We must ascribe the amendment, then, to some other cause than the dignity of a state. There is no difficulty in finding this cause. Those who were inhibited from commencing a suit against a state, or from prosecuting one which might be commenced before the adoption of the amendment, were persons who might probably be its creditors. There was not much reason to fear that foreign or sister states would be creditors to any considerable amount, and there was reason to retain the jurisdiction of the court in those *cases, because it might be essen- [*407] tial to the preservation of peace. The amendment, therefore, extended to suits commenced or prosecuted by individuals, but not to those brought by states.

The first impression made on the mind by this amendment is, that it was intended for those cases, and for those only, in which some demand against a state is made by an individual in the courts of the Union. If we consider the causes to which it is to be traced, we are conducted to the same conclusion. A general interest might well be felt in leaving to a state the full power of consulting its convenience in the adjustment of its debts, or of other claims upon it; but no interest could be felt in so changing the relations between the whole and its parts, as to strip the government of the means of protecting, by the instrumentality of its courts, the constitution and laws from active violation.

The words of the amendment appear to the court to justify and require this construction. The judicial power is not "to extend to any suit in law or equity commenced or prosecuted against one of the United States by citizens of another state, &c."

What is a suit? We understand it to be the prosecution, or pursuit, of some claim, demand, or request. In law language, it is the prosecution of some demand in a court of justice. The remedy for every species of wrong is, says Judge Blackstone, "the being put in possession of that right whereof the party injured is deprived." "The instruments whereby this remedy is obtained, are a diversity of suits and ac-
408*] tions, which are defined by the *Mirror to be 'the lawful demand of one's right.' Or, as Bracton and Fleta express it, in the words of Justinian, 'jus prosequendi in judicio quod alicui debetur.'" Blackstone then proceeds to describe every species of remedy by suit; and they are all cases where the party suing claims to obtain something to which he has a right.

To commence a suit, is to demand something by the institution of process in a court of justice; and to prosecute the suit, is, according to the common acceptation of language, to continue that demand. By a suit commenced by an individual against a state, we should understand process sued out by that individual against the state, for the purpose of establishing some claim against it by the judgment of a court; and the prosecution of that suit is its continuance. Whatever may be the stages of its progress, the actor is still the same. Suits had been commenced in the Supreme Court against some of the states before this amendment was introduced into Congress, and others might be commenced before it should be adopted by the state legislatures, and might be depending at the time of its adoption. The object of the amendment was not only to prevent the commencement of future suits, but to arrest the prosecution of those which might be commenced when this article should form a part of the constitution. It therefore embraces both objects; and its meaning is, that the judicial power shall not be construed to extend to any suit which may be commenced, or which, if 409*] already commenced, may be *prosecuted against a state by the citizen of another state. If a suit, brought in one court, and carried by legal process to a supervising court, be a continuation of the same suit, then this suit is not commenced nor prosecuted against a state. It is clearly in its commencement the suit of a state against an individual, which suit is transferred to this court, not for the purpose of asserting any claim against the state, but for the purpose of asserting a constitutional defense against a claim made by a state.

A writ of error is defined to be a commission by which the judges of one court are authorized to examine a record upon which a judgment was given in another court, and, on such examination, to affirm or reverse the same according to law. If, says my Lord Coke, by the writ of error, the plaintiff may recover, or be restored to anything, it may be released by the name of an action. In Bacon's Abridgment, tit. Error, L., it is laid down, that "where by a writ of error, the plaintiff shall recover, or be restored to any personal thing, as debt, damage, or the like, a release of all actions personal is a good plea; and when land is to be recovered or restored in a writ of error, a release of actions real is a good bar; but where by a writ of error the plaintiff shall not be restored to any personal or real thing, a release of all actions, real or personal, is no bar." And for this we have the authority of Lord Coke, both in his Commentary on Littleton and in his Reports. A writ of error, then, is in the nature of a suit or action when it is to restore the party who obtains it to the possession of anything which is withheld from him, *not when its operation is entirely de- [*410 fensive.

This rule will apply to writs of error from the courts of the United States, as well as to those writs in England.

Under the judiciary act, the effect of a writ of error is simply to bring the record into court, and submit the judgment of the inferior tribunal to re-examination. It does not in any manner act upon the parties; it acts only on the record. It removes the record into the supervising tribunal. Where, then, a state obtains a judgment against an individual, and the court, rendering such judgment, overrules a defense set up under the constitution or laws of the United States, the transfer of this record into the Supreme Court, for the sole purpose of inquiring whether the judgment violates the constitution or laws of the United States, can with no propriety, we think, be denominated a suit commenced or prosecuted against the state whose judgment is so far re-examined. Nothing is demanded from the state. No claim against it of any description is asserted or prosecuted. The party is not to be restored to the possession of anything. Essentially, it is an appeal on a single point; and the defendant who appeals from a judgment rendered against him, is never said to commence or prosecute a suit against the plaintiff who has obtained the judgment. The writ of error is given rather than an appeal, because it is the more usual mode of removing suits at common law; and because, perhaps, it is more technically proper where a single point of law, and not the whole case, is to *be [*411 re-examined. But an appeal might be given, and might be so regulated as to effect every purpose of a writ of error. The mode of removal is form, and not substance. Whether it be by writ of error or appeal, no claim is asserted, no demand is made by the original defendant; he only asserts the constitutional right to have his defense examined by that tribunal whose province it is to construe the constitution and laws of the Union.

The only part of the proceeding which is in any manner personal, is the citation. And what is the citation? It is simply notice to the opposite party that the record is transferred into another court, where he may appear, or decline to appear, as his judgment or inclination may determine. As the party who has obtained a judgment is out of court, and may, therefore, not know that his cause is removed, common justice requires that notice of the fact should be given him. But this notice is not a suit, nor has it the effect of process. If the party does not choose to appear, he cannot be brought into court, nor is his failure to appear considered as a default. Judgment cannot be given against him for his non-appearance, but the judgment is to be re-examined, and reversed or affirmed, in like manner as if the party had appeared and argued his cause.

The point of view in which this writ of error, with its citation, has been considered uniformly in the courts of the Union, has been well illustrated by a reference to the course of this court in suits instituted by the United States. The universally received opinion is, 412*] that no suit can be commenced *or prosecuted against the United States; that the judiciary act does not authorize such suits. Yet writs of error, accompanied with citations, have uniformly issued for the removal of judgments in favor of the United States into a superior court, where they have, like those in favor of an individual, been re-examined, and affirmed or reversed. It has never been suggested, that such writ of error was a suit against the United States, and, therefore, not within the jurisdiction of the appellate court.

It is, then, the opinion of the court, that the defendant who removes a judgment rendered against him by a state court into this court, for the purpose of re-examining the question, whether that judgment be in violation of the constitution or laws of the United States, does not commence or prosecute a suit against the state, whatever may be its opinion where the effect of the writ may be to restore the party to the possession of a thing which he demands.

But should we in this be mistaken, the error does not affect the case now before the court. If this writ of error be a suit in the sense of the 11th amendment, it is not a suit commenced or prosecuted "by a citizen of another state, or by a citizen or subject of any foreign state." It is not, then, within the amendment, but is governed entirely by the constitution as originally framed, and we have already seen, that in its origin, the judicial power was extended to all cases arising under the constitution or laws of the United States, without respect to parties. 413*] *2d. The second objection to the jurisdiction of the court is, that its appellate power cannot be exercised, in any case, over the judgment of a state court.

This objection is sustained chiefly by arguments drawn from the supposed total separation of the judiciary of a state from that of the Union, and their entire independence of each other. The argument considers the federal judiciary as completely foreign to that of a state; and as being no more connected with it, in any respect whatever, than the court of a foreign state. If this hypothesis be just, the argument founded on it is equally so; but if the hypothesis be not supported by the constitution, the argument fails with it.

This hypothesis is not founded on any words in the constitution, which might seem to countenance it, but on the unreasonableness of giving a contrary construction to words which seem to require it; and on the incompatibility of the application of the appellate jurisdiction to the judgments of state courts, with that constitutional relation which subsists between the government of the Union and the governments of those states which compose it.

Let this unreasonableness, this total incompatibility, be examined.

That the United States form, for many, and for most important purposes, a single nation, has not yet been denied. In war, we are one people. In making peace, we are one people. In all commercial regulations, we are one and the same people. In *many other re- 414 spects, the American people are one; and the government which is alone capable of controlling and managing their interests in all these respects, is the government of the Union. It is their government, and in that character they have no other. America has chosen to be, in many respects, and to many purposes, a nation; and for all these purposes, her government is complete; to all these objects, it is competent. The people have declared, that in the exercise of all powers given for these objects it is supreme. It can, then, in effecting these objects, legitimately control all individuals or governments within the American territory. The constitution and laws of a state, so far as they are repugnant to the constitution and laws of the United States, are absolutely void. These states are constituent parts of the United States. They are members of one great empire—for some purposes sovereign, for some purposes subordinate.

In a government so constituted, is it unreasonable that the judicial power should be competent to give efficacy to the constitutional laws of the legislature? That department can decide on the validity of the constitution or law of a state, if it be repugnant to the constitution or to a law of the United States. Is it unreasonable that it should also be empowered to decide on the judgment of a state tribunal enforcing such unconstitutional law? Is it so very unreasonable as to furnish a justification for controlling the words of the constitution?

We think it is not. We think that in a government *acknowledgedly supreme, [415 with respect to objects of vital interest to the nation, there is nothing inconsistent with sound reason, nothing incompatible with the nature of government, in making all its departments supreme, so far as respects those objects, and so far as is necessary to their attainment. The exercise of the appellate power over those judgments of the state tribunals which may contravene the constitution or laws of the United States, is, we believe, essential to the attainment of those objects.

The propriety of entrusting the construction of the constitution, and laws made in pursuance thereof, to the judiciary of the Union, has not, we believe, as yet, been drawn into question. It seems to be a corollary from this political axiom, that the federal courts should either possess exclusive jurisdiction in such cases, or a power to revise the judgment rendered in them, by the state tribunals. If the federal and state courts have concurrent jurisdiction in all cases arising under the constitution, laws, and treaties of the United States; and if a case of this description brought in a state court cannot be removed before judgment, nor revised after judgment, then the construction of the constitution, laws, and treaties of the United States, is not confided particularly to their judicial department, but is confided equally to that department and to the state courts, however they may be constituted. "Thirteen independent courts," says a very celebrated statesman (and we have now more than twenty such courts), "of final jurisdiction over the same causes, arising upon the same laws, is a hydra in government, from 416* *which nothing but contradiction and confusion can proceed."

Dismissing the unpleasant suggestion, that any motives which may not be fairly avowed, or which ought not to exist, can ever influence a state or its courts, the necessity of uniformity, as well as correctness in expounding the constitution and laws of the United States, would itself suggest the propriety of vesting in some single tribunal the power of deciding, in the last resort, all cases in which they are involved.

We are not restrained, then, by the political relations between the general and state governments, from construing the words of the constitution, defining the judicial power, in their true sense. We are not bound to construe them more restrictively than they naturally import.

They give to the Supreme Court appellate jurisdiction in all cases arising under the constitution, laws, and treaties of the United States. The words are broad enough to comprehend all cases of this description, in whatever court they may be decided. In expounding them, we may be permitted to take into view those considerations to which courts have always allowed great weight in the exposition of laws.

The framers of the constitution would naturally examine the state of things existing at the time; and their work sufficiently attests that they did so. All acknowledge that they were convened for the purpose of strengthening the confederation by enlarging the powers of the 417* government, and by giving efficacy *to those which it before possessed, but could not exercise. They inform us themselves, in the instrument they presented to the American public, that one of its objects was to form a more perfect union. Under such circumstances, we certainly should not expect to find, in that instrument, a diminution of the powers of the actual government.

Previous to the adoption of the confederation, Congress established courts which received appeals in prize causes decided in the courts of the respective states. This power of the government, to establish tribunals for these appeals, was thought consistent with, and was founded on, its political relations with the states. These courts did exercise appellate jurisdiction over those cases decided in the state courts, to which the judicial power of the federal government extended.

The confederation gave to Congress the power "of establishing courts for receiving and determining finally appeals in all cases of captures."

This power was uniformly construed to authorize these courts to receive appeals from the sentences of state courts, and to affirm or reverse them. State tribunals are not mentioned; but this clause in the confederation necessarily comprises them. Yet the relation between the general and state governments was much weaker, much more lax, under the confederation than under the present constitution; and the states being much more completely sovereign, their institutions were much more independent.

The convention which framed the constitution, on *turning their attention to the [*418 judicial power, found it limited to a few objects, but exercised, with respect to some of those objects, in its appellate form, over the judgments of the state courts. They extend it, among other objects, to all cases arising under the constitution, laws, and treaties of the United States; and in a subsequent clause declare, that in such cases, the Supreme Court shall exercise appellate jurisdiction. Nothing seems to be given which would justify the withdrawal of a judgment rendered in a state court, on the constitution, laws, or treaties of the United States, from this appellate jurisdiction.

Great weight has always been attached, and very rightly attached, to contemporaneous exposition. No question, it is believed, has arisen to which this principle applies more unequivocally than to that now under consideration.

The opinion of the Federalist has always been considered as of great authority. It is a complete commentary on our constitution; and is appealed to by all parties in the questions to which that instrument has given birth. Its intrinsic merit entitles it to this high rank; and the part two of its authors performed in framing the constitution, put it very much in their power to explain the views with which it was framed. These essays having been published while the constitution was before the nation for adoption or rejection, and having been written in answer to objections founded entirely on the extent of its powers, and on its diminution of state sovereignty, are entitled to the more consideration where they *frank- [*419 ly avow that the power objected to is given, and defend it.

In discussing the extent of the judicial power, the Federalist says: "Here another question occurs: what relation would subsist between the national and state courts in these instances of concurrent jurisdiction? I answer, that an appeal would certainly lie from the latter to the Supreme Court of the United States. The constitution in direct terms gives an appellate jurisdiction to the Supreme Court in all the enumerated cases of federal cognizance in which it is not to have an original one, without a single expression to confine its operation to the inferior federal courts. The objects of appeal, not the tribunals from which it is to be made, are alone contemplated. From this circumstance, and from the reason of the thing, it ought to be construed to extend to the state tribunals. Either this must be the case, or the local courts must be excluded from a concurrent jurisdiction in matters of national concern, else the judicial authority of the Union may be eluded at the pleasure of every plaintiff or prosecutor. Neither of these consequences ought, without evident necessity, to be involved; the latter would be entirely inadmissible, as it would defeat some of the most important and avowed purposes of the proposed government, and would essentially embarrass its measures. Nor do I perceive any foundation for such a supposition. Agreeably to the remark already made, the national and state systems are to be regarded as one whole. The courts of the latter will of course be natural 420* auxiliaries to the execution of the laws of the Union, and an appeal from them will as naturally lie to that tribunal which is destined to unite and assimilate the principles of natural justice, and the rules of national decision. The evident aim of the plan of the national convention is, that all the causes of the specified classes shall, for weighty public reasons, receive their original or final determination in the courts of the Union. To confine, therefore, the general expressions which give appellate jurisdiction to the Supreme Court, to appeals from the subordinate federal courts, instead of allowing their extension to the state courts, would be to abridge the latitude of the terms, in subversion of the intent, contrary to every sound rule of interpretation."

A contemporaneous exposition of the constitution, certainly of not less authority than that which has been just cited, is the judiciary act itself. We know that in the Congress which passed that act were many eminent members or the convention which formed the constitution. Not a single individual, so far as is known, supposed that part of the act which gives the Supreme Court appellate jurisdiction over the judgments of the state courts in the cases therein specified, to be unauthorized by the constitution.

While on this part of the argument, it may be also material to observe that the uniform decisions of this court on the point now under consideration, have been assented to, with a single exception, by the courts of every state in the Union whose judgments have been revised. 421* It has been the unwelcome duty of this tribunal to reverse the judgments of many state courts in cases in which the strongest state feelings were engaged. Judges, whose talent and character would grace any bench, to whom a disposition to submit to jurisdiction that is usurped, or to surrender their legitimate powers, will certainly not be imputed, have yielded without hesitation to the authority by which their judgments were reversed, while they, perhaps, disapproved the judgment of reversal.

This concurrence of statesmen, of legislators, and of judges, in the same construction of the constitution, may justly inspire some confidence in that construction.

In opposition to it, the counsel who made this point has presented in a great variety of forms, the idea already noticed, that the federal and state courts must, of necessity, and from the nature of the constitution, be in all things totally distinct and independent of each other. If this court can correct the errors of the courts of Virginia, he says it makes them courts of the United States, or becomes itself a part of the judiciary of Virginia.

But, it has been already shown that neither of these consequences necessarily follows. The American people may certainly give to a national tribunal a supervising power over those judgments of the state courts, which may conflict with the constitution, laws, or treaties of the United States, without converting them into federal courts, or converting the national into a state tribunal. The one court still de- [422] rives its authority from the state, the other still derives its authority from the nation.

If it shall be established, he says, that this court has appellate jurisdiction over the state courts in all cases enumerated in the 3d article of the constitution, a complete consolidation of the states, so far as respects judicial power, is produced.

But, certainly, the mind of the gentleman who urged this argument is too accurate not to perceive that he has carried it too far; that the premises by no means justify the conclusion. "A complete consolidation of the states, so far as respects the judicial power," would authorize the legislature to confer on the federal courts appellate jurisdiction from the state courts in all cases whatsoever. The distinction between such a power, and that of giving appellate jurisdiction in a few specified cases in the decision of which the nation takes an interest, is too obvious not to be perceived by all.

This opinion has been already drawn out to too great a length to admit of entering into a particular consideration of the various forms in which the counsel who made this point has, with much ingenuity, presented his argument to the court. The argument in all its forms is essentially the same. It is founded, not on the words of the constitution, but on its spirit, a spirit extracted, not from the words of the instrument, but from his view of the nature of our Union, and of the great fundamental principles on which the fabric stands.

To this argument, in all its forms, the same answer may be given. Let the nature and objects of our Union be considered; let [423] the great fundamental principles, on which the fabric stands, be examined; and we think the result must be, that there is nothing so extravagantly absurd in giving to the court of the nation the power of revising the decisions of local tribunals on questions which affect the nation, as to require that words which import this power should be restricted by a forced construction. The question, then, must depend on the words themselves; and on their construction we shall be the more readily excused for not adding to the observations already made, because the subject was fully discussed and exhausted in the case of Martin v. Hunter.

3d. We come now to the third objection, which, though differently stated by the counsel, is substantially the same. One gentleman has said that the judiciary act does not give jurisdiction in the case.

The cause was argued in the state court, on a case agreed by the parties, which states the prosecution under a law for selling lottery tickets, which is set forth, and further states the act of Congress by which the city of Washington was authorized to establish the lottery. It then states that the lottery was regularly established by virtue of the act, and concludes with referring to the court the questions, whether the act of Congress be valid? whether on its just construction, it constitutes a bar to the prosecution? and, whether the act of Assembly, on which the prosecution is founded, be not itself invalid? These questions were decided against the operation of the act of Congress, and in favor of the operation of the act of the state.

424*] *If the 25th section of the judiciary act be inspected, it will at once be perceived that it comprehends expressly the case under consideration.

But it is not upon the letter of the act that the gentleman who stated this point in this form, founds his argument. Both gentlemen concur substantially in their views of this part of the case. They deny that the act of Congress, on which the plaintiff in error relies, is a law of the United States; or, if a law of the United States, is within the second clause of the sixth article.

In the enumeration of the powers of Congress, which is made in the 8th section of the first article, we find that of exercising exclusive legislation over such district as shall become the seat of government. This power, like all others which are specified, is conferred on Congress as the legislature of the Union; for, strip them of that character, and they would not possess it. In no other character can it be exercised. In legislating for the district, they necessarily preserve the character of the legislature of the Union; for, it is in that character alone that the constitution confers on them this power of exclusive legislation. This proposition need not be enforced.

The 2d clause of the 6th article declares, that "this constitution, and the laws of the United States, which shall be made in pursuance thereof, shall be the supreme law of the land."

The clause which gives exclusive jurisdiction is, unquestionably, a part of the constitution, and, as such, binds all the United States. Those who contend that acts of Congress, made 425*] in pursuance of *this power, do not, like acts made in pursuance of other powers, bind the nation, ought to show some safe and clear rule which shall support this construction, and prove that an act of Congress, clothed in all the forms which attend other legislative acts, and passed in virtue of a power conferred on, and exercised by Congress, as the legislature of the Union, is not a law of the United States, and does not bind them.

One of the gentlemen sought to illustrate his proposition that Congress, when legislating for the district, assumed a distinct character, and was reduced to a mere local legislature, whose laws could possess no obligation out of the ten miles square, by a reference to the complex character of this court. It is, they say, a court of common law and a court of equity. Its character, when sitting as a court of common law, is as distinct from its character when sitting as a court of equity, as if the powers belonging to those departments were vested in different tribunals. Though united in the same tribunal, they are never confounded with each other.

Without inquiring how far the union of different characters in one court may be applicable, in principle, to the union in Congress of the power of exclusive legislation in some places, and of limited legislation in others, it may be observed, that the forms of proceedings in a court of law are so totally unlike the forms of proceedings in a court of equity, that a mere inspection of the record gives decisive information of the character in which the court sits, and consequently of the extent of its powers. But *if the forms of proceeding were *426 precisely the same, and the court the same, the distinction would disappear.

Since Congress legislates, in the same forms, and in the same character, in virtue of powers of equal obligation, conferred in the same instrument, when exercising its exclusive powers of legislation, as well as when exercising those which are limited, we must inquire whether there be anything in the nature of this exclusive legislation which necessarily confines the operation of the laws made in virtue of this power to the place with a view to which they are made.

Connected with the power to legislate within this district, is a similar power in forts, arsenals, dock-yards, &c. Congress has a right to punish murder in a fort, or other place within its exclusive jurisdiction; but no general right to punish murder committed within any of the states. In the act for the punishment of crimes against the United States, murder committed within a fort, or any other place or district of country, under the sole and exclusive jurisdiction of the United States, is punished with death. Thus Congress legislates in the same act, under its exclusive and its limited powers.

The act proceeds to direct, that the body of the criminal, after execution, may be delivered to a surgeon for dissection, and punishes any person who shall rescue such body during its conveyance from the place of execution to the surgeon to whom it is to be delivered.

*Let these actual provisions of the *427 law, or any other provisions which can be made on the subject, be considered with a view to the character in which Congress acts when exercising its powers of exclusive legislation.

If Congress is to be considered merely as a local legislature, invested, as to this object with powers limited to the fort, or other place, in which the murder may be committed, if its general powers cannot come in aid of these local powers, how can the offense be tried in any other court than that of the place in which it has been committed? How can the offender be conveyed to, or tried in, any other place? How can he be executed elsewhere? How can his body be conveyed through a country under the jurisdiction of another sovereign, and the individual punished, who, within that jurisdiction, shall rescue the body.

Were any one state of the Union to pass a law for trying a criminal in a court not created by itself, in a place not within its jurisdiction, and direct the sentence to be executed without its territory, we should all perceive and acknowledge its incompetency to such a course of legislation. If Congress be not equally incompetent, it is because that body unites the powers of local legislation with those which are to operate through the Union, and may use the last in aid of the first; or because the power of exercising exclusive legislation draws after it, as an incident, the power of making that legislation effectual, and the incidental power may 428* be exercised *throughout the Union, because the principal power is given to that body as the legislature of the Union.

So, in the same act, a person who, having knowledge of the commission of murder, or other felony, on the high seas, or within any fort, arsenal, dock-yard, magazine, or other place, or district of country within the sole and exclusive jurisdiction of the United States, shall conceal the same, &c., he shall be adjudged guilty of misprision of felony, and shall be adjudged to be imprisoned, &c.

It is clear, that Congress cannot punish felonies generally; and, of consequence, cannot punish misprision of felony. It is equally clear, that a state legislature—the state of Maryland, for example—cannot punish those who, in another state, conceal a felony committed in Maryland. How, then, is it that Congress, legislating exclusively for a fort, punishes those who, out of that fort, conceal a felony committed within it?

The solution, and the only solution of the difficulty is, that the power vested in Congress, as the legislature of the United States, to legislate exclusively within any place ceded by a state, carries with it, as an incident, the right to make that power effectual. If a felon escape out of the state in which the act has been committed, the government cannot pursue him into another state, and apprehend him there, but must demand him from the executive power of that other state. If Congress were to be considered merely as the local legislature for the fort or other place in which the offense might be committed, then this principle would 429* apply to them as to other local legislatures, and the felon who should escape out of the fort, or other place, in which the felony may have been committed, could not be apprehended by the marshal, but must be demanded from the executive of the state. But we know that the principle does not apply; and the reason is, that Congress is not a local legislature, but exercises this particular power, like all its other powers, in its high character, as the legislature of the Union. The American people thought it a necessary power, and they conferred it for their own benefit. Being so conferred, it carries with it all those incidental powers which are necessary to its complete and effectual execution.

Whether any particular law be designed to operate without the district or not, depends on the words of that law. If it be designed so to operate, then the question, whether the power so exercised be incidental to the power of exclusive legislation, and be warranted by the constitution, requires a consideration of that instrument. In such cases the constitution and the law must be compared and construed. This is the exercise of jurisdiction. It is the only exercise of it which is allowed in such a case. For the act of Congress directs, that “no other error shall be assigned or regarded as a ground of reversal, in any such case as aforesaid, than such as appears on the face of the record, and immediately respects the before-mentioned questions of validity or construction of the said constitution, treaties,” &c.

The whole merits of this case, then, consist in the construction of the constitution and the act of Congress. *The jurisdiction of [430 the court, if acknowledged, goes no further. This we are required to do, without the exercise of jurisdiction.

The counsel for the state of Virginia have, in support of this motion, urged many arguments of great weight against the application of the act of Congress to such a case as this; but those arguments go to the construction of the constitution, or of the law, or of both; and seem, therefore, rather calculated to sustain their cause upon its merits, than to prove a failure of jurisdiction in the court.

After having bestowed upon this question the most deliberate consideration of which we are capable, the court is unanimously of opinion, that the objections to its jurisdiction are not sustained, and that the motion ought to be overruled.

Motion denied.

The cause was this day argued on the merits.

Mr. D. B. Ogden, for the plaintiffs in error, stated, that the question of conflict between the act of Congress and the state law, which arose upon the record, depended upon the 8th section of the first article of the constitution, giving to Congress the exclusive power of legislation, in all cases whatsoever, over the district which had become the seat of the government of the United States, by cession from the states to whom it formerly belonged. Under this power, Congress has authorized the establishment of a lottery at the seat of government. Can *the state of Virginia prevent the [431 sale of tickets in that lottery within her territory, consistently with the constitution? This question must depend upon the nature of the constitutional power of Congress, and of the law by which it is exercised. It was said by the counsel for the defendant in error, on the former argument, that the power is municipal, to be exercised over the district only, and, of course, confined in its operation to the limits of the district. But, in order to determine whether this is the true interpretation of the clause in question, we must more minutely examine what is the nature of the authority granted. The clause was not intended to give to Congress an unlimited power to legislate in all cases, without reference to other provisions of the constitution. Otherwise Congress might pass bills of attainder and ex post facto laws, and exercise a despotic authority over the District of Columbia, and its citizens would thus be deprived of their rights entirely. Nor was it intended to authorize the exercise by Congress of its general powers as a national legislature, within the district. Nor to exempt the district from the operation of those general powers. But the clause was inserted for the purpose of securing the independence of the national legislature, and government, from state control. The object in view was, therefore, strictly a national object. The district was created only for national purposes, and every law passed for its government is peculiarly a national law. The words, “ex-432*clusive *legislation in all cases whatsoever,” were meant to exclude all state legislative power; and to vest in Congress in addition to its general powers over the whole Union, all possible powers of legislation over the district. The law in question, is the expression of the national will on a national object. It is, then, an act of the general legislative power of the Union, and its operation must be co-extensive with the limits of the Union, unless it is limited to the District of Columbia in express terms, or from the nature of the power itself being incapable of acting without the district. That the whole Union has an interest in the city of Washington, as the national capital, is shown by the contemporaneous exposition of the constitution by its framers, and by the subsequent acts of the national legislature, providing for its improvement and embellishment. It is admitted, that some of the provisions of the law now in question, are local in their very nature, and, therefore, confined to the city, or the district, in their operation. But the power of the corporation to establish lotteries, with the consent of the President, is not of this nature. Lottery tickets are an article of commerce, vendible in every part of the Union, as well as in the District of Columbia. A state law which forbids a citizen to sell or buy a ticket in a lottery, legally established by the national legislature, for national purposes, infringes the constitutional rights of the citizen, and tends to impede and defeat the exercise of this national power. He cannot be punished by a state, for selling or buying that which 433* Congress *has, in the exercise of a great national power, authorized to be bought or sold. The authority of establishing this lottery, so far from being confined to the city, could not be conveniently or effectually exercised without extending the salable quality of the tickets throughout the Union. As a source of revenue, it would be inadequate to the objects for which it was established, without this extension. It is not one of the ordinary sources of revenue for the mere municipal wants of the city. It is a national grant for national purposes, to be used in each particular instance, with the approbation of the President. It is, then, a national law, enacted for a national purpose, and has no other limits in its operation than the limits of the legislative power itself. If Congress had intended to confine its operation within the District of Columbia, they would have expressed that intention. If, then, Congress have a right to raise a revenue, for any national purpose, by establishing a lottery, they had a right to establish this lottery; and no state law can defeat this, any more than the exercise of any other national power. But even supposing that it is not a tax or duty, such as Congress have the express power of establishing; yet if it be necessary and proper, in the judgment of the court, to carry into effect any power expressly granted, such as that of establishing and governing the city, it may be exercised throughout the Union. Congress have the same power to establish lotteries for this purpose as the state legislatures, and every other legislature, have. The only difference is, 434* that *with Congress it is the exercise of a national power, and must, therefore, be co-extensive in its operation with the Union, although the money to be raised by it cannot be applied to the use of any other city in the Union than that which is the national capital, and in which, consequently, all the states, and all the people, have a common interest.

Mr. Webster, contra, insisted, that Congress had not the power, under the constitution, of establishing a lottery in the District of Columbia, for municipal purposes, and of forcing the sale of the tickets throughout the Union, in contravention of the state laws; and, that even if they had the power, the law now in question did not purport to authorize the corporation of the city of Washington thus to force the sale of the tickets. It is clear that Congress, as a legislative body, exercise two species of legislative power: the one, limited as to its objects, but extending all over the Union; the other, an absolute, exclusive legislative power over the District of Columbia. The preliminary inquiry in the case now before the court, is, by virtue of which of these authorities was the law in question passed? When this is ascertained, we shall be able to determine its extent and application. In this country, we are trying the novel experiment of a divided sovereignty, between the national government and the states. The precise line of division between these is not always distinctly marked. Government is a moral, not a mathematical science; and the powers of such a government especially, cannot be defined with mathematical *accuracy [*435 and precision. There is a competition of opposite analogies. We arrive at a just conclusion by reasoning from these analogies, and by a general regard to the objects and purposes of this scheme of government. With a view to the present question, it may, perhaps, be safely admitted, that there are certain acts of legislation passed by Congress, with a local reference to this district, which proceed from the general powers with which Congress are invested. They are local in their immediate operation and effect, but they are passed in virtue of general legislative powers. Such are the acts appropriating moneys for constructing the navy yard and the capitol. Some other acts are of a mixed nature. There are others clearly local, and passed in virtue of the local, exclusive jurisdiction. And of this latter class is the act now under consideration. It is for the establishment of a local city government, which arises from the exclusive power of legislation; and the clause authorizing the establishment of lotteries, is combined with other clauses of a mere municipal character. Noscitur a sociis. Every act of legislation must be limited by its subject-matter, and there is nothing to show that this power is to be exercised more extensively than the other powers of the corporation; nothing to show that this municipal power is to be carried beyond the city. It may be exercised within the city alone, and Congress has not said, and the court cannot intend, that it is to be exercised in other parts of the Union. Congress could not give such a charter to any other city in the Union, and if every federal *power granted in [*436 the constitution were destroyed, this power would remain. It exists independently, and the legislative powers of the states can never conflict with it, because it can never operate within the states. Being a case of mere local legislation, it is not a casus fœderis within that clause of the constitution which declares that the laws of the United States shall be the supreme law of the land. There can be no question of supremacy and subordination where there is no connection or conflict. The constitution makes this provision, because other legislative powers were to operate throughout the Union; the Congress and the states were to legislate over the same subjects, and over the same territory; and therefore there might be conflict. It was because the two codes were to prevail in the same places, and over the same persons. But the provision cannot extend to laws enacted by Congress for the mere local municipal government of the city, because the reason on which it is founded does not extend to a case where all legislation is necessarily exclusive. There was no more reason in this instance to provide for a conflict of the two authorities, than in the case of the laws of a foreign state, which, except in the familiar example of questions relative to the lex loci contractus, cannot come in collision with our own laws, because they cannot operate extraterritorially. So here, from the very nature of things, there can arise no conflict between the local laws of the District of Columbia, and those of the states, because each code is confined to its own territory. Any sound interpretation of the 437 *] law *in question, must limit it to the city of Washington. It does not even extend to the other municipal corporations within the District of Columbia, because it contains provisions expressly for the government of Washington alone, and does not profess to extend any of them beyond the limits of that city. A law cannot exceed the authority of the law-giver, and that does not extend beyond the district, and is limited in its actual exercise to the city. There is no authority showing that a grant of power of this kind to a municipal corporation extends beyond the local limits of the city.

The Attorney-General, for the plaintiffs in error, in reply, contended, that Congress, in passing the law under consideration, acted in the name of the whole nation, and for a great national object. Congress did not, as contended in the argument on the jurisdiction of the court, succeed, by the cession, merely to the legislative powers of Maryland and Virginia, over this district. They are not the trustees of those states only; they are the trustees of the whole Union. The cession was to the Congress and government of the United States. The jurisdiction over the territory belongs to the entire people of the United States. It is not the power of Maryland and Virginia which Congress represents, but the power of all the states; and the territory ceded is to be looked at, not with reference to its origin, not as still forming ideally a part of Maryland and Virginia, but is to be regarded as if incorporated into every state in the Union. The question is not, then, 438 *] to be solved by asking *what those states could do with respect to this territory, but what each state of the Union could do, with regard to its own territory; because, to borrow an expression from the municipal law, each state of the Union is seized jointly with all the rest, per me et per tout, of the whole jurisdiction over this territory. The acts of the Congress in legislating for the District of Columbia are the acts of all the people of all the states. It is therefore a fallacy in argument to represent Congress as succeeding merely to the same degree of power which Maryland and Virginia formerly had over this territory. Could those states have taxed the other states, or borrowed money on their credit, for the improvement of this territory, as Congress have done? Although the jurisdiction of the states who formerly held the sovereignty and domain of this territory has been supplanted by Congress, the substituted jurisdiction is far more extensive than that which they held. It is a jurisdiction, which in the instances mentioned, and many others which might be enumerated, is capable of affecting all the states. It cannot be denied that the character of the jurisdiction which Congress has over the district, is widely different from that which it has over the states; for, over them, Congress has not exclusive jurisdiction. Its powers over the states are those only which are specifically given, and those which are necessary to carry them into effect; whilst over the district it has all the powers which it has over the states, and in addition to these, a power of legislation exclusive of *all the states. [439 But although the jurisdiction over the district is of a different and more extensive character, yet it is not so circumscribed that it may not incidentally affect the states, although exerted for a local purpose, as it is called. Such is sometimes the delusive effect of single words and phrases, that the position, that in legislating for the District of Columbia, Congress is a local legislature, for local purposes, and therefore cannot affect the states by its laws, has almost become an aphorism with indolent or prejudiced inquirers. But in what sense can that be called a local government which proceeds from the whole body of the nation? And how can that be termed a local object, which is closely and inseparably connected with the general interest of the whole people of the Union? As well might it be asserted that Congress acted as a local legislature, when it established offices for the sale of lands in the western states, or fortifications at particular points on the seacoast. It will not be pretended that the first establishment of the seat of government in this district, was an act done by Congress in its character of a local legislature, and for local purposes. How, then, can the subsequent acts for the improvement and embellishment of the city be so regarded? The act of May 6th, 1796, authorized the commissioners for erecting the public buildings to borrow money for that purpose. Would it have been competent for the legislatures of the states to have impeded this loan by punishing their citizens for subscribing to this stock? And could the states prohibit the sale of the city lots within their territory, and thus arrest *the improvement of the [440 city? And if they could not, it is not because what Congress in the legitimate exercise of its powers has made it lawful to sell, the states cannot make it unlawful to buy? Let us test by these considerations the question before the court; and let us distinguish between Congress legislating for the municipal government of the city, and Congress, in its national character, providing the means of adding necessary public improvements to the national capital. Congress has itself made this distinction. When a regulation for the mere internal police of the city is to be made, it is done by the corporation, or some other inferior agent, without the interference of the President of the United States. But, when an alteration of the plan of the city, or a public improvement affecting the whole of the city in a national point of view, is to be made, it is uniformly subjected to the control of the President. So here the specific purpose in view, and for which the lottery was authorized by the President, was the establishment of a city hall, a necessary consequence of the establishment of the city, which last was also a necessary consequence of the establishment of the seat of government.

The opinion of the court was delivered by Mr. Chief Justice MARSHALL:

This case was stated in the opinion given on the motion for dismissing the writ of error for want of jurisdiction in the court. It now comes on to be decided on the question whether the Borough Court of Norfolk, in overruling the 441* defense set up under *the act of Congress, has misconstrued that act. It is in these words:

"The said corporation shall have full power to authorize the drawing of lotteries for effecting any important improvement in the city, which the ordinary funds or revenue thereof will not accomplish. Provided, that the sum to be raised in each year shall not exceed the amount of $10,000. And provided, also, that the object for which the money is intended to be raised shall be first submitted to the President of the United States, and shall be approved of by him."

Two questions arise on this act:

1st. Does it purport to authorize the corporation to force the sale of these lottery tickets in states where such sales may be prohibited by law? If it does,

2d. Is the law constitutional?

If the first question be answered in the affirmative, it will become necessary to consider the second. If it should be answered in the negative, it will be unnecessary, and consequently improper, to pursue any inquiries, which would then be merely speculative, respecting the power of Congress in the case.

In inquiring into the extent of the power granted to the corporation of Washington, we must first examine the words of the grant. We find in them no expression which looks beyond the limits of the city. The powers granted are all of them local in their nature, and all of them such as would, in the common course of things, 442* if not necessarily, be exercised *within the city. The subject on which Congress was employed when framing this act was a local subject; it was not the establishment of a lottery, but the formation of a separate body for the management of the internal affairs of the city, for its internal government, for its police. Congress must have considered itself as delegating to this corporate body powers for these objects, and for these objects solely. In delegating these powers, therefore, it seems reasonable to suppose that the mind of the legislature was directed to the city alone, to the action of the being they were creating within the city, and not to any extraterritorial operations. In describing the powers of such a being, no words of limitation need be used. They are limited by the subject. But, if it be intended to give its acts a binding efficacy beyond the natural limits of its power, and within the jurisdiction of a distinct power, we should expect to find, in the language of the incorporating act, some words indicating such intention.

Without such words, we cannot suppose that Congress designed to give to the acts of the corporation any other effect, beyond its limits, than attends every act having the sanction of local law, when anything depends upon it which is to be transacted elsewhere.

If this would be the reasonable construction of corporate powers generally, it is more especially proper in a case where an attempt is made so to exercise those powers as to control and limit the penal laws of a state. This is an operation which was not, *we think, in [443 the contemplation of the legislature, while incorporating the city of Washington.

To interfere with the penal laws of a state, where they are not leveled against the legitimate powers of the Union, but have for their sole object the internal government of the country, is a very serious measure, which Congress cannot be supposed to adopt lightly, or inconsiderately. The motives for it must be serious and weighty. It would be taken deliberately, and the intention would be clearly and unequivocally expressed.

An act, such as that under consideration, ought not, we think, to be so construed as to imply this intention, unless its provisions were such as to render the construction inevitable.

We do not think it essential to the corporate power in question, that it should be exercised out of the city. Could the lottery be drawn in any state of the Union? Does the corporate power to authorize the drawing of a lottery imply a power to authorize its being drawn without the jurisdiction of a corporation, in a place where it may be prohibited by law? This, we think, would scarcely be asserted. And what clear legal distinction can be taken between a power to draw a lottery in a place where it is prohibited by law and a power to establish an office for the sale of tickets in a place where it is prohibited by law? It may be urged, that the place where the lottery is drawn is of no importance to the corporation, and therefore the act need not be so construed as to give power over the place, but that the right to sell tickets throughout the United *States is of im- [444 portance, and therefore ought to be implied.

That the power to sell tickets in every part of the United States might facilitate their sale, is not to be denied; but it does not follow that Congress designed, for the purpose of giving this increased facility, to overrule the penal laws of the several states. In the city of Washington, the great metropolis of the nation, visited by individuals from every part of the Union, tickets may be freely sold to all who are willing to purchase. Can it be affirmed that this is so limited a market that the incorporating act must be extended beyond its words, and made to conflict with the internal police of the states, unless it be construed to give a more extensive market?

It has been said that the states cannot make it unlawful to buy that which Congress has made it lawful to sell.

This proposition is not denied; and, therefore, the validity of a law punishing a citizen of Virginia for purchasing a ticket in the city of Washington, might well be drawn into question. Such a law would be a direct attempt to counteract and defeat a measure authorized by the United States. But a law to punish the sale of lottery tickets in Virginia, is of a different character. Before we can impeach its validity, we must inquire whether Congress intended to empower this corporation to do any act within a state which the laws of that state might prohibit.

445*] *In addition to the very important circumstance, that the act contains no words indicating such intention, and that this extensive construction is not essential to the execution of the corporate power, the court cannot resist the conviction, that the intention ascribed to this act, had it existed, would have been executed by very different means from those which have been employed.

Had Congress intended to establish a lottery for those improvements in the city which are deemed national, the lottery itself would have become the subject of legislative consideration. It would be organized by law, and agents for its execution would be appointed by the President, or in such other manner as the law might direct. If such agents were to act out of the district, there would be, probably, some provision made for such a state of things, and in making such provisions Congress would examine its power to make them. The whole subject would be under the control of the government, or of persons appointed by the government.

But in this case no lottery is established by law, no control is exercised by the government over any which may be established. The lottery emanates from a corporate power. The corporation may authorize, or not authorize it, and may select the purposes to which the proceeds are to be applied. This corporation is a being intended for local objects only. All its capacities are limited to the city. This, as well as every other law it is capable of making, is a by-law, and, from its nature, is only co-extensive with the city. It is not probable that such 446*] *an agent would be employed in the execution of a lottery established by Congress; but when it acts, not as the agent for carrying into effect a lottery established by Congress, but in its own corporate capacity, from its own corporate powers, it is reasonable to suppose that its acts were intended to partake of the nature of that capacity and of those powers; and, like all its other acts, be merely local in its nature.

The proceeds of these lotteries are to come in aid of the revenues of the city. These revenues are raised by laws whose operation is entirely local, and for objects which are also local; for no person will suppose, that the President's house, the Capitol, the Navy Yard, or other public institution, was to be benefitted by these lotteries, or was to form a charge on the city revenue. Coming in aid of the city revenue, they are of the same character with it; the mere creature of a corporate power.

The circumstances, that the lottery cannot be Wheat. 6.

drawn without the permission of the President, and that this resource is to be used only for important improvements, have been relied on as giving to this corporate power a more extensive operation than is given to those with which it is associated. We do not think so.

The President has no agency in the lottery. It does not originate with him, nor is the improvement to which its profits are to be applied to be selected by him. Congress has not enlarged the corporate power by restricting its exercise to cases of which the President might approve.

*We very readily admit, that the act [*447 establishing the seat of government, and the act appointing commissioners to superintend the public buildings, are laws of universal obligation. We admit, too, that the laws of any state to defeat the loan authorized by Congress, would have been void, as would have been any attempt to arrest the progress of the canal, or of any other measure which Congress may adopt. These, and all other laws relative to the district, have the authority which may be claimed by other acts of the national legislature; but their extent is to be determined by those rules of construction which are applicable to all laws. The act incorporating the city of Washington is, unquestionably, of universal obligation; but the extent of the corporate powers conferred by that act, is to be determined by those considerations which belong to the case.

Whether we consider the general character of a law incorporating a city, the objects for which such law is usually made, or the words in which this particular power is conferred, we arrive at the same result. The corporation was merely empowered to authorize the drawing of lotteries; and the mind of Congress was not directed to any provision for the sale of the tickets beyond the limits of the corporation. That subject does not seem to have been taken into view. It is the unanimous opinion of the court, that the law cannot be construed to embrace it.

*JUDGMENT.—This cause came on to [*448 be heard on the transcript of the record of the Quarterly Session Court for the borough of Norfolk, in the commonwealth of Virginia, and was argued by counsel. ## GIBBONS v. OGDEN.

A decree of the highest court of equity of a state, affirming the decretal order of an inferior court of equity of the same state, refusing to dissolve an injunction granted on the filing of the bill, is not a final decree within the 25th section of the judiciary act of 1789, ch. 20, from which an appeal lies to this court.

APPEAL from the court for the trial of impeachments and the correction of errors of the state of New York.

This was a bill filed by the plaintiff below (Ogden), against the defendant below (Gibbons), in the Court of Chancery of the state of New York, for an injunction to restrain the defendant from navigating certain steamboats on the waters of the state of New York, lying between Elizabethtown, in the state of New Jersey, and the city of New York; *the exclusive navigation of which with steamboats had been granted, by the legislature of New York, to Livingston & Fulton, under whom the plaintiff below claimed as assignee. On this bill an injunction was granted by the Chancellor, and on the coming in of the answer, which set up a right to navigate with steamboats between the city of New York and Elizabethtown, under a license to carry on a coasting trade, granted under the laws of the United States, the defendant below moved to dissolve the injunction, which motion was denied by the Chancellor. The defendant below appealed to the court for the trial of impeachments and correction of errors; the decretal order, refusing to dissolve the injunction, was affirmed by that court; and from this last order the defendant below appealed to this court, upon the ground that the case involved a question arising under the constitution, laws, and treaties of the United States.

The cause was opened for the appellant by Mr. D. B. Ogden; but on inspecting the record, it not appearing that any final decree in the cause, within the terms of the 25th section of the judiciary act of 1789, ch. 20, had been pronounced in the State Court, the appeal was dismissed for want of jurisdiction.

DECREE.—This cause came on to be heard on the transcript of the record of the court for the trial of impeachments and the correction of errors, of *the state of New York. [*450 On inspection whereof, it is ordered, that the appeal, in this cause be, and the same is hereby dismissed, it not appearing from the record that there was a final decree in said court for the correction of errors, &c., from which an appeal was taken.]

HUGHES v. BLAKE.

A decree cannot be pronounced, on the testimony of a single witness, unaccompanied by corroborating circumstances, against a positive denial, by the defendant, of any matter directly charged by the bill, in the defendant's answer, or answer in support of his plea.

A replication to a plea is an admission of the sufficiency of the plea, as much as if it had been set down for argument and allowed; and all that the defendant has to do, is to prove it in point of fact, and a dismissal of the bill on the hearing is then a matter of course.

Under what circumstances a plea of a former judgment at law, for the cause of action, is a good bar in equity.

A PPEAL from the Circuit Court of Massachusetts.

The object of the bill in equity filed in this case, was to recover from the defendant, Blake, a sum of money arising from the sale of a tract of land, called Yazoo lands, alleged to have been made in 1795, by the defendant, as agent of certain persons named in the bill, in which lands the plaintiff, Hughes, claimed an equitable interest, in common with the immediate principals of the defendants, and, therefore, to be entitled to a proportion of the proceeds resulting from the sale. The bill also charged, that the defendant had rendered himself distinctly liable for a specific sum of money, in virtue of a certain order, having reference to the plaintiff's interest in the lands, drawn by one Gibson, in September, 1796, in favor of the plaintiff, and accepted by the defendant, with certain modifications and conditions, as particularly expressed in the acceptance.

NOTE.—Where an answer denies a fact unequivocally, and under oath, and is responsive to the bill, such fact must usually be proved, not only by testimony of one witness, so as to neutralize that denial and oath, but by some additional evidence, in order to turn the scales for the plaintiff. Geary, 5 Pet. 99; Pomeroy v. Manin, 2 Paine, 476; Green v. Vardiman, 2 Blackf. 324; Jenison v. Graves, 2 Black. 440.

The additional evidence must be a second witness, or very strong circumstances. 1 Wash. C. C. 230; Hughes v. Blake, 1 Mason, C. C. 515; 3 Gill & Johns, 425; 1 Paige, 239; 3 Wend. 532; 2 John. Some cases introduce several qualifications or limitations to the above rule. 9 Cranch, 160; 1 J. J.

Massachusetts, in the year 1810, upon a suit commenced against him by the present plaintiffs, in 1804, being long before the exhibition of the present bill, for the same cause of action. The plea averred, that the judgment at law was still in force; that the matters in controversy, and the parties in both suits, were the same; that the whole merits of the case, as stated by the bill, were fully heard, tried, and determined in the action at law, and in a court of competent jurisdiction; and that the judgment was obtained fairly, and without fraud, covin, or misrepresentation, or the taking any undue advantage. It was also averred by the plea, that no evidence has come to the plaintiff's knowledge, since the trial at law, respecting any of the facts alleged in the bill, and which he did not, or might not have produced on such trial; and further, that the defendant has at no time, as alleged in the bill, obtained of a certain E. Williams, any allowance or payment, for, or on account of his, the defendant's, being liable as bail for Gibson, in the plaintiff's bill mentioned, and for which liability he has claimed in the action at law an indemnity out of a fund on the credit of which he had accepted the order in favor of the plaintiff. The defendant, then, without waiving his plea, proceeded to answer and deny the matters alleged by the bill, as circumstances of equity to avoid the effect of the proceedings at law, and which he had already denied by the averment in his plea.

455* To this plea and answer the plaintiff filed a general replication in the usual form, and witnesses were examined by both parties.

At the hearing, the identity of the causes of action were sought to be established, without the aid of collateral proof, from a comparison of the matters set forth in the bill, with the averments contained in the several counts of the plaintiff's declaration; it appearing, moreover, that, in the trial at law, the plaintiff had submitted to the jury, in support of these counts, the depositions of the same witnesses, on whose evidence he relied, in support of his bill. The principal other question of fact related to the subject of the negotiation respecting the lands before mentioned, alleged in the plaintiff's bill to have taken place in 1814, between the defendant and E. Williams, whose testimony respecting it was insisted by the plaintiff, not to be sufficient to outweigh the effect of the positive denials contained in his plea and answer.

The cause being heard on the issue joined, and the proofs taken in it, the court below decreed that the plea was sufficiently proved, and therefore dismissed the bill with costs, and the cause was brought by appeal to this court.

Mr. Pinkney, for the appellant, stated three questions for the consideration of the court: (1) Whether the plea was in itself sufficient, supposing its sufficiency to be now an open question. (2) Whether it has been proved. (3) Whether its sufficiency, supposing it to be proved, is now open for inquiry. The 456 first of these questions being answered negatively, and the third affirmatively, would produce a reversal of the decree; and let them be answered as they might, if the second be answered negatively, a reversal would equally follow.

1. The plaintiff's allegations must be taken to be true, except so far as the averments in the plea, and the answer in support of the plea, deny them.<sup>1</sup> And if the plea does not deny whatever is alleged, and if true, would make

To outweigh an answer responsive to the allegations of the bill, the complainant must produce two witnesses, or one witness supported by corroborating circumstances. Pember v. Mathews, 1 Bro. Ch. The reason is, the plaintiff calls upon defendant to answer the allegation he makes, and thereby admits the evidence. Being testimony, it is equal to the testimony of any other witness. And as, in order that the plaintiff may prevail, he must have the balance of proof in his favor, he must have something in addition to his single witness, in order to turn the balance. Clark v. Van Riemdsdyk, 9 Cranch, 153.

But the rule as above stated does not necessarily require the oral testimony of even one witness to disprove the answer. Circumstances alone, if sufficiently strong, may outweigh an answer though positive and responsive to the bill. Id.

The general rule of courts of chancery is, that when the answer of the defendant is responsive to the bill and denies the allegations under oath, it is evidence for the defendant. Field v. Holland, 6 Cranch, 8; Russell v. Clark, 7 Cranch, 69; Hughes v. Blake, 6 Wheat. 453; 1 Mas. 518; Union Bk. v. Geary, 5 Pet. 99; Daniel v. Brown, 2 How. 406; *Carpenter v. Prov. Ins. In so far as the answer sets up new facts, by way of discharge or avoidance, or upon affirmative defenses, not responsive to the bill, these must be established by independent proof. The answer is not evidence in support of them. Bk. of U. S. v. Beverly, 1 How. 134; 17 Pet. 127; McCoy v. Rhodes, 11 How. 131; Gaines v. Hennen, 24 How. 553; *Flagg v. As to how far the answer of one defendant to a bill in chancery is evidence for or against his co-defendant, see note to Leeds v. Marine Ins. Co., 2 Wheat. 380.

the plea no bar, it is no plea.<sup>1</sup> The result of an examination of the allegations in the bill will be found to be, that the defendant was the legal owner of the notes taken for the sale of the lands, by taking and holding them in his own name; that the plaintiff, and the other persons interested, were cestui que trusts according to their respective interests, explained and known to the defendant; that the defendant's conditional acceptance of the order in the plaintiff's favor, so far as it affected to authorize him to apply the plaintiff's interest as an indemnity for his liability as Gibson's bail, being without the plaintiff's consent, did not destroy the defendant's character of trustee. That when he afterwards sold the plaintiff's interest (it being still a merely equitable one in the view of chancery, the conditional acceptance being of no force in equity), in order to apply the money to the wrongful purpose of the conditional acceptance, the defendant still remained answerable, in equity, upon the 457* foundation of the original trust. That the defendant knew all the material facts charged in the bill, out of which arose the trust, and breach of trust, and his alleged continuing accountability. That the defendant, insisting upon thus misapplying the money, the plaintiff mistaking the proper forum, sued the defendant at law, and a verdict and judgment passed against him; and the bill charges the defendant's breaches of trust, and abuse of his power as legal owner in taking advantage of the plaintiff, and the impossibility of his obtaining a full and fair trial of the whole merits at law, as reasons why the verdict and judgment should not be suffered to prevent relief in equity. The defendant, notwithstanding all this, pleads the verdict and judgment in bar of the relief and discovery. The plea leaves uncontradicted whatever in the bill showed a mere equitable trust, and undue advantage taken of the defendant's character of legal owner and holder of the fund. Since, then, the plaintiff could obtain relief nowhere, but upon the mere trust, which was properly cognizable in chancery; and even if it were barely possible that a court of law could relieve, and that great difficulties only stood in the way arising out of the nature of the subject, his miscarriage at law ought not to oust a court of equity of its power of relief in a matter appertaining to its jurisdiction. It cannot be denied on the other side, that a judgment at law may be relieved against in equity upon equitable inducements of various kinds. Cases of this sort furnish the familiar and ordinary 458* business of the Court of *Chancery.<sup>2</sup> The only question, therefore, is upon what grounds will it relieve? I admit, with Lord Chancellors Eldon and Redesdale, that mere inattention, omission, or neglect, however fatal the consequences may be, shall not of itself be a ground of equitable relief against a judgment at law.<sup>3</sup> But where the matter is cognizable in equity, although also cognizable at law, and effectual cognizance has not, and cannot be taken at law, chancery will relieve against a judgment at law; especially if the matter is better adapted to equitable cognizance, and forms a favorite subject of that jurisdiction. The instances put by Lord Redesdale of cases in which equity will interfere, although a verdict and judgment have been obtained at law, are only put by way of example.<sup>4</sup> They are not all the excepted cases; and the case actually before him, where he refused to interfere, was a case of crassa negligentia on the part of the defendant at law. If there has been no such gross negligence, and if the court of law be not only of competent jurisdiction, but competent to do justice in the case, from the nature of the subject, and its mode of proceeding, doubtless its judgment is conclusive. But this does not exclude the right of equity to control the judgment of a court of law for equitable purposes. It is no just reproach to a court of law, that it cannot do complete justice in all cases where it may have jurisdiction. The *question is, whether [459 it has adequate jurisdiction; and if it has not, equity will and ought to interfere; as in the case of a bond given for the purchase money of lands, and a suit at law brought upon it; and after judgment, a fatal defect discovered in the title; a court of equity will enjoin and relieve against the judgment, although it has no natural jurisdiction over a suit brought for a specialty or simple contract debt. In the view of a court of equity, a party who elects an incompetent forum, is not concluded by its judgment. The question still recurs, had he, and could he have justice there? The terms of the averment of the present plea are also important to be considered. The plea alleges, that the merits were fully and fairly tried. But if it appears that, in the nature of things, there were inherent difficulties in opposition to a full trial of the real merits, the plea cannot be true. The general rule, that whatsoever might have been, and was litigated at law, is concluded, need not be denied, if taken with this qualification, that it be fully and fairly litigated, and there be no equitable reason why the judgment should be set aside. But if there be new evidence discovered, or fraud, or an unconscientious advantage taken by the opposite party, or matters of equity which a court of law could not effectually investigate and decide, then the judgment at law is not conclusive.

Let us now see whether this case, as it appears on the bill, and the record pleaded as a bar, was properly and effectually relievable at law. And, in order to do this, it is necessary to examine the counts of *the plaintiff's [460 declaration in the suit at law, which a court of equity will do with a hypercritical eye, when it becomes necessary to inquire whether a judgment of a court of law is fit to bar its own jurisdiction. It does not act on such an occasion as an appellate court; but it looks to the case with a view to see whether justice could be effectually done by the court of law. Lord Redesdale, in the case before alluded to, inquired what was open before the jury;<sup>5</sup> and an examination of the counts in this declaration has the same object, and the further object, to ascertain whether any judgment could have been recovered upon them.

The learned counsel here entered into a minute analysis of the counts, in order to show that complete justice could not be done in the action at law, upon the equitable merits of the case, considered as a case of trust, complicated accounts, and fraud.

The original trust was never tried, and could not be tried. A declaration could not be framed to try it fully and effectually. A complicated account may indeed be examined at law. There is no defect of jurisdiction; but there is an insurmountable difficulty in doing justice. A court of law is not adapted, although it has jurisdiction, to arrive at a just result on such a subject; and as matters of account are a proper subject of equitable jurisdiction, equity will interpose on the mere ground of that difficulty, notwithstanding there has been a trial at law. The want of the defendant's oath, which this 461*] bill, in seeking *relief, calls for, was alone an insurmountable obstacle. This is not a bill for discovery merely; if it was, it could not be maintained; for then it would not be a case for equitable cognizance, and the plaintiff should have come here for a discovery during the lis pendens at law. But although it is a bill for relief, discovery is most important to that relief. The relief was always in the power of a court of equity, and one of the reasons why this court ought not to be satisfied with what has been done at law, is, that at law, there could be no discovery. The examination into the trust, and its abuses, could not be complete without the defendant's oath. If the plaintiff had come into equity seeking discovery and relief, while the suit was depending at law, the Court of Equity would have taken the whole cause under its care, and would have determined it as now required to do; and the principle is not altered by the suit at law having proceeded to judgment, since the cause has not yet been decided upon the defendant's oath. Where a bill alleges that a verdict has been obtained, on a matter of equitable cognizance, against the defendant's knowledge of the merits, a reliance upon such a verdict is as much against conscience as to that defendant, as the alleged breach of trust itself. In this case, the plea is no bar to the relief, if the defendant's knowledge makes the verdict unconscientious. A judgment may, indeed, be pleaded in bar, where the matter has been fully tried, and where the judgment is not impeached through the conscience of the defendant. If the bill alleges nothing, that if true, convicts the defendant of knowledge that 462*] his *verdict is against conscience, the plea is good. But a court of equity ought not to relinquish its jurisdiction, until the defendant has maintained the verdict, on a matter of equitable cognizance, by his oath.

2. It has already been shown, that the merits of the cause could not have been fully and fairly tried at law, and the judge's charge shows that they were not. But it is said that the plaintiff ought then to have moved for a new trial; and certainly upon a matter which a court of law only had a right to dispose of, this would have been the proper course. But this is a matter of equity, and if the party will set up a trial at law as a bar to equitable relief, he must show it, as he alleges it to be, a full and fair trial, and that

3. But supposing the plea to be proved, is its sufficiency now open for inquiry? And certainly the general rule would exclude that inquiry; pleas are not usually forestalled by the bill; but if the bill shows what, if true, would invalidate the plea, taking issue on it does not cure the defect.<sup>1</sup> But, it has been before shown, that this bill does allege such matter, and the plea admits the whole of it by not denying it. It is true that the defendant cannot amend his plea, but he may be ordered to answer, reserving him the benefit of his plea at the hearing, and in that mode justice will be done.
